The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON], on which the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana involves to a considerable extent the merits of the bill which is now before the Senate, and in speaking upon that amendment I shall speak upon the bill in its different aspects and bearings, so that in the remarks I now make I may say all that I desire to say on the subject.

The bill might very aptly be styled a bill to extirpate illiteracy in the United States, and briefly and substantially it proposes to appropriate $15,000,000 at once for this purpose, and to diminish the appropriation by $1,000,000 every year for ten years, when it shall cease. The money is to be distributed among the States in proportion to the number of persons within the school age in each who are unable to read and write. It requires that each State shall expend of its own revenue one-third as much as it receives from the United States, and then limits the money to be expended for the support of normal schools to one-tenth part of the amount received. It leaves the States free under these restrictions to expend the money according to their own judgment. It does not attempt to create a new class of teachers and superintendents who shall be in exclusive relations with the National Government.

That is, I believe, a fair analysis of the substance of the bill; and in the discussion of it two questions naturally arise—first, the power to pass such a bill as this; and second, the policy of it. In other words, can Congress enact such a measure as this; and if it can, is it politic and proper that it should be done?

The Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES] the other day, in the few and forcible remarks which he submitted to the Senate on this question, went back to the early history of this country in reference to the subject of education and showed to some extent the policy of the Government in regard to it. In finding his warrant for sustaining the bill he produced the decision of what are known as the Slaughter-house cases, in 16 Wallace's Reports, that decision being based upon the recent amendments to the Constitution. For one I did not require any amendment to the old Constitution; I did not require the thirteenth, the fourteenth, or the fifteenth amendment, or all of them together, to enable me to find the power of Congress to do this.

That decision of the Supreme Court comes in very well to show an additional reason why Congress should do this thing; that on account of this very large citizenship being added to the country it is compelled in justice and in good conscience to help mitigate the evils imposed by that sudden addition to the mass of citizenship. To that extent it is a very strong and very powerful argument. But that we had the power before the recent amendments I am perfectly satisfied. Indeed, the Senator from Florida himself in the citation of precedents from the ordinances of 1785 and 1787 showed that we had the power and that it had been carefully and tenderly guarded by the Government at all times. Probably in the nature of things no more would be needed than the citations that he made of the practice of the Government under those ordinances. But this matter came once so clearly before the Supreme Court long before the recent amendments were ever adopted or before they were ever dreamed of, when the complexion of the court was essentially different from what it is now and from what it has been for the past twenty years, that I deem it not inappropriate to cite the language of the unanimous court, speaking through Judge Campbell, in 18 Howard's Reports, the case of Cooper vs. Roberts, page 177. This case came from Michigan:

The appropriation of public lands for that object became a fundamental principle by the ordinance of 1787, which settled terms of compact between the people and States of the Northwestern territory and the original States, unalterable except by consent. One of the articles affirmed that "religion, morality, and knowledge, being necessary for good government and the happiness of mankind," and ordained that "schools and the means of education should be forever encouraged." This principle was extended first by Congressional enactment (1 Statutes at Large, 550, section 6), and afterward, in 1802, by compact between the United States and Georgia to the Southwestern territory.

After citing the history of that, he proceeds:

But the constancy with which the United States have adhered to the policy in the various compacts with the people of the newly found States and the care which Congress has manifested to prevent the accumulation of prior obligations which might interrupt it fully display their estimate of its value and importance. There is obviously a definite purpose declared to consecrate the same central section of every township of every State which might be added to the Federal system to the promotion "of good government and the happiness of mankind" by the spread of "religion, morality, and knowledge," and thus, by a uniformity of local association, to plant in the heart of every community the same sentiments of grateful reverence for the wisdom, forecast, and magnanimous statesmanship of those who framed the institutions for these new States before the Constitution for the old had yet been modeled.

That is the preface of Judge Campbell, speaking for a unanimous court, to the law in the case which he afterward announces. In this same volume a very important case came up from Saint Louis in reference to schools, the somewhat noted case of Kissell vs. Saint Louis Public Schools Board, decided by the same court unanimously; and in passing I will say that that Saint Louis grant made in 1812 came three times before the Supreme Court for construction, for interpretation, and a defining of the extent of that grant as interfering possibly with other grants; and yet with all this litigation, and with a case from Michigan before it and a case from Wisconsin in ninety-fifth United States Reports, the point never occurred of bringing in doubt or in dispute the power of Congress to make these grants in any case it saw proper; and as the Senator from Florida well said, if you could grant lands you could of course grant the money; if you could grant land worth a dollar and a quarter an acre you could grant the dollar and a quarter in money.

The purpose of such a grant of lands has always been to make a permanent fund to increase in value as the necessities of the schools should increase. So that no fine-spun theory can bring an argument to show a distinction in the power to make the grant as between money and land. Then, taking these cases as a sample and taking the custom of the Government to exempt, as it has frequently done, school property or property devoted to school purposes from taxation, there can not be any dispute as to the power of Congress to do this under the Constitution as it was before the recent amendments were ever dreamed of.

In a tolerably recent case in the ninety-ninth volume of United States Reports which came from Illinois in reference to the exemption of property there, the Supreme Court held that when that exemption was passed and when it was accepted it became in the nature of a contract, and could not be impaired and could not be repealed by a subsequent act of the Legislature. That was an exemption under the statute of Illinois for school purposes. So then we see, outside now of the modern phase presented by the recent amendments or any construction of them, there can be no doubt as to the power.

Now, what has been the custom of the Government? I hold in my hand a report from the General Land Office made in 1880. It is a very instructive document on this point, showing the different grants made from time to time for school purposes and how sacredly they have been guarded by legislation, how sacredly they have been guarded by the courts whenever they came to be enforced and construed. I will not detain the Senate by reading the report, but running from page 221 to 230 of this volume there is a full list of all these donations, from which some of the best schools in the country have sprung and out of which have grown some of the finest institutions in the country.

I have alluded to an act of 1812 in reference to a grant for school purposes at Saint Louis. By the act of 5th of April, 1826 (6 Statutes at Large, page 339), there was granted for the education of the deaf and dumb and for the erection of an asylum in Kentucky one township of land, excepting the sixteenth section, to be located in one of the Territories on lands to which the Indian title had been extinguished. By the act of March 3, 1843, the trustees of the Centre College of Kentucky were invested with all the rights of the deaf and dumb asylum of Kentucky in the grant, provided that the proceeds of the sale of the lands were not diverted from the purposes and intention of the original grant. So this was combined with the capital of the Centre College of Kentucky, from whose academic shades have come some of the best scholars in the country. Now, going back to 1812—

The grant to Jefferson College, Mississippi, is concisely stated in the order of the Secretary of the Treasury dated October 5, 1812.

That was an important grant, and one that was specially guarded and taken care of. So we go on—it would take too long to cite these different grants—until we come to the latter-day grants, one of which I wish to allude to more particularly:

July 2, 1862, Congress enlarged the national educational endowment system by the donation to each State of 30,000 acres of public land not otherwise reserved (no mineral lands could be selected and selections must be of quarter-sections) for each Senator and Representative (to which such State was entitled under the apportionment of 1860), for the support of colleges for the cultivation of agricultural and mechanical science and art. It was championed in the Senate by Hon. JUSTIN S. MORRILL, of Vermont.

Subsequent to that, within the past two or three years, we passed a bill under the management and direction of the same eminent Senator not going as far as this bill, but a bill going in the same direction, by a vote that amounted to two-thirds of the Senate, I believe. I cheerfully advocated and voted for that bill, as I do for this.

Then look, Mr. President, not to detain the Senate by reading, at the 2 per cent. funds, the 5 per cent. funds of the net proceeds of sales of public lands for school purposes, heretofore so freely and bountifully given to certain States.

In view of these precedents we need not spend any more time on the point that the power always existed and was never questioned, as is said in the address of three eminent gentlemen that I hold in my hand. I ask attention of the Senate for a while to this memorial. We have gone through the era when the control of the Government in all its branches was in the hands of an entirely different complexion, politically speaking, from those in which it is now. This memorial considers that period and considers the period subsequent to that. It is from the trustees of the Peabody fund.

The trustees of the Peabody fund at their meeting in 1880 designated a committee to address Congress on the very subject we now have in hand. That committee consisted of the present Chief-Justice of the United States, who presides over the first court that sits in the civilized world; of an ex-Attorney-General and an ex-Secretary of State, Mr. Evarts, and of the accomplished Secretary of the Interior under Mr. Fillmore, Mr. Alexander H. H. Stuart, of Virginia. That was the committee appointed by these trustees to draft a memorial to Congress. They drafted this memorial, and I wish now to read some parts of it. After showing the necessity of Congressional aid, they say, on page 11:

The next point which your committee have felt it to be their duty to consider is, does Congress possess the constitutional power, not to control, but to contribute to, the education of citizens of the States?

This bill does not control, for, as I stated in the analysis I have made of it, it does not attempt to interfere with the management at all except in section 5, where it speaks of a certain limited course to be pursued.

Does Congress possess the constitutional power, not to control, but to contribute to the education of citizens of the States?

If doubts were entertained as to the existence of such a power in an unqualified form, it might well be contended that the case of the colored population is surrounded by such peculiar circumstances as to take it out of the influence of any general rule. But fortunately this question, even in its general aspect, is not a new one, presented now for the first time to be decided. It may be regarded as res adjudicata. The laws of the United States present innumerable precedents in which Congress has exercised the power to contribute toward the general education of citizens of the new States, and in no instance has its constitutional right to do so been questioned.

They proceed; they go over the same precedents the Senator from Florida alluded to the other day and some of which I have alluded to. Then there is a discussion which I will not detain the Senate with upon the new feature of the large class of population enfranchised to which the Senator from Florida called our attention on Friday. Then they say:

The experience of this board has demonstrated the propriety of using the officers connected with the school systems of the respective States as agents in the application of the funds of the Peabody board to the purposes of the trust.

That is what this bill proposes to do.

All the Southern States seem now to have awakened to a sense of the importance of a general system of free schools. Most of them have organized efficient systems of instruction so far as their limited means will allow them to go.

I desire the Senator from Kansas who sits nearest the door [Mr. PLUMB] to hear this part of this memorial, because it answers some of the propositions that he stated the other day to the Senate.

Most of them have organized efficient systems of instruction so far as their limited means will allow them to go. Faithful and competent officers have in most instances been put in charge of them. These agencies are too important to be overlooked.

Then proceeding with the position that, in the somewhat dismantled condition of those States, if education is left to the States it will never be carried on fully, or at least not for years to come, an actual and a positive demonstration is made in the memorial that there is no means adequate, except the national means, to the performance of this great task. They review in this memorial the condition of the Southern States; and I want Senators to bear in mind that I believe every Southern State has come with proper guards both in its constitution and in its statutory laws on this subject; but on account of the misfortunes to which they have been subjected, and on account of the troubles and difficulties that they have encountered, because of their poverty and the great debts most of them bear, they can not meet the exigency of the case; but that they have shown a willingness to do so as far as they can in most cases there can not be any doubt.

What is the problem presented to us? Illiteracy is the disease to be cured; this is the poison to be extracted; and it is right and proper to base the contribution upon that. You can fix no other standard so reasonable and fair.

I feel assured in saying that without some safeguard on this subject not one of the Southern States would have been received back, as Mr. Lincoln termed it, into practical relations with the other States of this Union. The necessities of the public were so great, the sensibility was so acute on this subject, that if one of these States had lingered or hesitated in the matter of education it would not have been received back into the community of States. When the battle for the political life of the State of Arkansas was being fought, when the balance stood wavering here, persons unable to decide what should be its fate, gentlemen in the highest position as officers of this land wrote to me and telegraphed to me to let them see our school law, and when I transmitted that school law there was no longer any doubt as to the fate of that struggle which was then going on for the political entity of the State of Arkansas. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to that, and from that, connected with the statistics furnished by the Senator from New Hampshire who has charge of this bill, I will make the remarks that I desire to submit.

Article 14 of the constitution framed in 1874 by the State of Arkansas, under the title of "Education," is:

SECTION 1. Intelligence and virtue being the safeguards of liberty and the bulwark of a free and good government, the State shall ever maintain a general, suitable, and efficient system of free schools, whereby all persons in the State between the ages of 6 and 21 years may receive gratuitous instruction.

SEC. 2. No money or property belonging to the public school fund or to this State for the benefit of schools or universities shall ever be used for any other than for the respective purposes to which it belongs.

SEC. 3. The General Assembly shall provide by general laws for the support of common schools by taxes, which shall never exceed in any one year 2 mills on the dollar on the taxable property of the State; and by an annual per capita tax of $1, to be assessed on every male inhabitant of this State over the age of 21 years: Provided, The General Assembly may by general law authorize school districts to levy, by a vote of the qualified electors of such district, a tax, not to exceed 5 mills on the dollar in any one year, for school purposes.

Such a law has been passed in pursuance of that provision, and now it stands as a statute of the State of Arkansas:

Provided further, That no such tax shall be appropriated to any other purpose, nor to any other district than that for which it was levied.

SEC. 4. The supervision of public schools, and the execution of the laws regulating the same, shall be vested in and confided to such officers as may be provided for by the General Assembly.

That is the organic law of the State of Arkansas on the subject of free schools. Under the statistics furnished by the Senator from New Hampshire, gathered from the reports of the superintendents of common schools in that State, we find that she has assessed and paid out, in round numbers, at the rate of about $400,000 a year for the common-school system. And I will state now in reference to those statistics that they are incomplete. On account of the overflow at the time the first of those reports was made and the destruction of property there and the lateness of the crops there were no collections in some of the best counties or in comparatively few, but we have an expenditure for two years of $800,000 for about, in round numbers, 150,000 children, ranging between 6 and 21 years of age. When you look at the complexion of the population of that State you will find that in eight or ten or a dozen counties possibly it would stand in the ratio of a thousand blacks to about two hundred whites. When you go then to other portions of the State the exact reverse of the picture is presented, so far as the complexion of the people is concerned.

It was intimated the other day by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] that this appeared to him to be a contribution really in the name of the colored persons when, in point of fact, the whites would get the benefit of it. That is a mistake, I think, and the recitation of the facts in connection with my own State sufficiently refutes that. There is no distinction in that State; the colored and the white children share the contribution alike. They go into separate schools as a matter of course, which the courts in the different States have decided to be constitutional, because that is not a distinction based either upon race or upon color.

Now, I find in the State of Kentucky, for example, they had a law that levied contributions from the whites to educate the white children, and from blacks to educate the black children. I am not sure, but I am of the impression that law has been repealed.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to ask the Senator what proportion of the taxes of the State of Arkansas are paid by the white people?

Mr. GARLAND. That was a point I had in my mind, but probably I was not explicit on it. I said in reference to as many as probably ten or a dozen counties the population would stand in about the ratio of a thousand blacks to two hundred whites, and in the rest of the State the complexion of the population was just the reverse. The ratio of the payment of taxes is much greater than the white population to the colored. I am not able to give the figures now, but I can safely make that statement.

Mr. FRYE. I should like right there, if it will not disturb the Senator, to ask him a question.

Mr. GARLAND. No disturbance at all.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator states that under the laws distinct and separate schools are had for colored and white. Does that extend all over the State?

Mr. GARLAND. It does in my State. I am not prepared to say as to all States.

Mr. FRYE. I am speaking of the Senator's State.

Mr. GARLAND. Yes.

Mr. FRYE. How, then, do you manage there in sparsely settled districts, where the division must make the schools exceedingly small?

Mr. GARLAND. In some of them they are exceedingly small; not exceeding ten, or probably sometimes fifteen; but we have a law under which we can transfer from one district to another if the school is too small, and a number of transfers have been made.

Mr. FRYE. So that under the law no one is excluded.

Mr. GARLAND. No person is excluded at all.

Mr. FRYE. Now, I should like to ask the Senator another question, for I have the profoundest confidence in his judgment and his humanity both and his entire fairness of statement. I wish to know from the Senator whether or not in Arkansas, on the part of educators, there is any prejudice against the education of the colored children at all?

Mr. GARLAND. If I was now about to utter the last words I ever expected to say on this earth I would say frankly that there is not, so far as I know; and a little further on I will attempt to show that we want to educate the colored people, and that it is very important to us that they should be educated.

I was referring to what I believe to be the only matter that I could ascertain after examination which looked to a distinction, and that was a law adopted in Kentucky. I believe, though I am not sure, that that has been repealed; but whether it has or not, the courts have held that it was unconstitutional in the case of Claybrook and others vs. City of Owensborough, in 16 Federal Reporter. It was held that that distinction could not be made; that all must be taxed alike, and all pay alike, and they must all share the benefits alike.

I can not find any distinction anywhere, answering more explicitly now the question propounded by the Senator from Maine. We have in Arkansas the law in reference to transfers, not only to suit colored people if they are not properly situated in some cases, but to suit the white people likewise. When I was governor of the State of Arkansas there was established a normal school at the town of Pine Bluff. I appointed a colored man the superintendent and the professor and president of that school, and I am happy to say I receive from him now regular reports that his school is prospering, and those reports that he makes are corroborated by citizens around and about it.

We may debate as much as we please about the theoretical question, that oft-repeated one, whether the colored man can be educated; but in my judgment it is something that never will be settled. I know in many instances colored people have been educated, and I do know that as citizens they have the franchise in their hands and have a right to the honors of this Government, which has been accorded to them now by all the States; and this being so, an effort should be made in the direction of improving and elevating them. If they are to be citizens, they should be made the very best of citizens. They should be made, if possible, the most accomplished of citizens. They should know the value of the ballot that is put in their hands; they should know the value of civil rights; and for one, as I took the stump in favor of the present constitution of Arkansas and was the first governor under it, I did not mean to humbug anybody then, nor do I mean to humbug any one now. I want all races in this country to be brought up to the very highest phase of education, brought to the very front rank of knowledge and information. It is as important to the people with whom they are thrown daily that they be educated as it is to themselves.

I do not believe, so help me Heaven, that there is any prejudice on the part of the educated classes in the State of Arkansas, to which my knowledge is confined principally, to the education of the colored people as far as and as much as the means given to them will enable them to do so. If we have done our best and are continuing to do our best, as this precedent has been established all along the line from the earliest history of the Government, with this accumulated mass of population upon us, it seems to me there is but one duty, and that is to vote this aid. If not in the particular shape in which the Senator from New Hampshire has proposed it, let us in good faith address ourselves to putting it in proper shape and rendering this aid. The able gentlemen who present the memorial to which I have referred say on this point:

By the operation of causes which have already been adverted to, it so happens that this class of our population, which at the date of our independence and for some years afterward was diffused over all the colonies, is now confined mainly to the Southern States. These States have not been insensible of the mischief to be apprehended from the presence of so large a class of ignorant voters, and they have manifested the most praiseworthy disposition to aid, as far as their means would allow, in their education.

That is the language of these gentlemen, spoken in truth and fairness to the Southern States.

Mr. President, looking at this subject for myself with all the lights that surround me and surround this country, and it is one that I have given some considerable attention to, I do not know how my friends on the other side can say sincerely to the colored man, "We want to educate you, and yet will not vote for this bill or something similar to it." I do not understand how they can make it clear to him that they are sincere when they withhold this effort to help him for ten years until these States get upon a sound footing and wipe away the rubbish and débris now resting on them, and become self-sustaining. On the other hand, I do not see how our friends on this side, if they be in earnest in their constitutions and statutory laws in reference to common schools in this new era (not doubting, of course, the power of Congress to do it), can withhold their support from a measure of this kind.

I look upon this measure as being the most important one that has been before Congress for many, many days; and for my State I look upon it as the most important bill to us that has been proposed here. We are struggling there with conscientious energy and with a high purpose to accomplish these ends, but by reason of circumstances not within our control we are not able to meet the requirements of the time. Many of our schools hold sessions only two and some three months in the year. If this aid is given to us—an aid, if you please, equal to what we contribute ourselves, though that would not be in a generous spirit; it would be to a certain extent taking out the life and spirit of this bill—much good will be accomplished.

I say with that aid we can meet in a reasonable, an honorable, and a competent way this great exigency, and I for one look upon this as the presentation now of the question, Are we together upon the great question of the day? Certainly, in the name of Heaven, after twenty years nearly of peace, we ought to be a unit upon some one question, and not be standing in the shadows of the past and fighting our battles over again, but doing something for the advancing and fast approaching future. Already by reason of circumstances—the blame of which I lay at no man's door—many parts of the country have been utterly destitute of the facilities of education, and in the region from which I come we have not been able to educate our children to grow up as they ought to do. It is time we were meeting together on some proposition, because now when June and July come on and the different schools hold their commencements the country will be flooded with essays praising an laduding education; it will be in the mouth of every schoolboy in the country who comes out from the academic halls of the schools of this country. That high-sounding sentiment is well responded to in the provision I read from the constitution of Arkansas. Now, if we are really sincere, let us manifest our sincerity; and of all things to me it would be the best and proudest day since I have been here to see this measure, substantially as it is, meet with the entire approval of the Senate.

In conclusion, I implore both sides and all sides to come together and vote for this bill and be a unit upon it, as we have been talking about it and promising it for years and years past.

SENATE CONTINGENT FUND.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator from Texas allow me to present a conference report? It will take but a moment. Under the rules it is privileged, I believe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MILLER, of California, in the chair). The report will be received.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on Senate resolution No. 64, providing for the addition of $10,000 to the contingent fund of the Senate, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment, and agree to an amendment as follows: In line 4, after the word "for," insert the words "the payment of the current;" and the Senate agree to the same.

JOHN SHERMAN,
JAMES S. WILSON,
M. C. BUTLER,

SAM'L J. RANDALL,
WM. S. HOLMAN,
THOS. RYAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the report of the conference committee be concurred in. It is a mere formal matter.

The report was concurred in.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (H. R. 351) authorizing the muster-in and discharge of Henry Z. Blinn;

A bill (H. R. 2487) for the relief of Bvt. Maj. Gen. William W. Averell, United States Army;

A bill (H. R. 1615) for the relief of the heirs of the late Langley B. Culley; and

A bill (H. R. 3932) directing the Adjutant-General of the United States Army to place the name of James M. Thomas on the muster-rolls of Company C, Second Regiment Tennessee Mounted Infantry, and for other purposes.

The bill (H. R. 1567) for the relief of the legal representatives of the late Capt. John G. Tod, of the Texas navy, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 1926) to define the boundaries of the collection districts of Miami and Sandusky, in the State of Ohio; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 1927) granting a pension to O. F. Miller; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6073) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, and for other purposes.

On motion of Mr. ALLISON, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist on its amendment to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and ask a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the presiding officer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHERMAN) appointed Mr. ALLISON, Mr. HALE, and Mr. BECK the conferees on the part of the Senate.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. HARRISON to the amendment offered by Mr. PLUMB.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, I propose to state briefly the reasons for the vote I shall cast against this bill. I am opposed to it both on principle and as a measure of policy. If it can be justified at all, it can only be under the "general-welfare" clause of the Constitution, and such a construction of that instrument as would justify any measure not embraced within its inhibitions. I can not yield my assent to a construction which would, in my judgment, overthrow the plain meaning and intent of the Constitution, and substitute the discretion of Congress as the sole limitation upon Congressional power, as this would. This would be centralization in its most matured, enlarged, and perfected form.

The admission that Congress has the power to do all things not prohibited by the Constitution which in the judgment of Congress the "general welfare" requires, which must be made by all who support this bill, is one I can not make, however much I might desire for my State the benefits of the bill. The grants of land by Congress to the several States for educational purposes have been adverted to in this debate as precedents sustaining the proposed exercise of power in this bill. The two cases are utterly unlike in every respect. Congress possesses plenary power under article 4, section 3, of the Constitution, over the public lands, and may make any disposition whatever of them. The public lands are the property of the Government, which the Constitution expressly authorizes Congress to dispose of as Congress may see fit. The grants to the States of portions of these lands were a legitimate exercise of constitutional power.

The $105,000,000 sought to be appropriated by this bill will be taken by taxation from the pockets of the people, which Congress has not the power at will and pleasure to dispose of as it has of the public lands. Congress has been granted the power to levy and collect taxes for certain defined and specific purposes, and I find nowhere in the Constitution that this power may be exercised for the purposes expressed in this bill. I agree fully with Senators who hold that universal suffrage and universal education should go together, but it must be remembered that the exclusive right to regulate suffrage exists in the States. The States are left by the Constitution to regulate and control both suffrage and education. I am opposed to Congressional interference with these prerogatives of the States.

If the constitutional power exists in Congress to levy and collect taxes from the people for the purpose of partially defraying the expense of public schools in the States, it exists for the purpose of paying the entire cost of the public schools of all the States whenever Congress shall choose to exercise it. I hold it to be an undeniable proposition that if Congress has the constitutional power to appropriate money for the public schools it also has the power to regulate its disbursement, to say who shall receive its benefits, and to appoint its own agents to distribute and administer it, and to prescribe in general and in detail how and where, and when, and to whom, and through whom, and upon what requirements and conditions it shall go. In other words, if it be admitted that Congress has the power to levy and collect taxes in order to raise revenue to be expended in the several States in maintaining public schools, I hold that the power of Congress to take charge of the subject of education in the States and control the children and the schools through Federal agencies and instrumentalities can not be controverted, because the powers of Congress are supreme wherever its jurisdiction extends. The passage of this bill will be a complete surrender of the whole question; not that the bill goes the length I have indicated, for it does not, but it does to the fullest extent admit the power of Congress over the subject. This bill would be only a commencement; the balance would follow as surely as the ear of corn follows the planting of the seed. It is the history of every tribunal, of every department, of every government in the world, a history which tells of no exception, that jurisdiction once exercised is never relinquished, is never restrained to the point of commencement, but that it always grows, is always expanded, and forever reaches out for more. No government in the world has ever exemplified this principle more fully or perfectly than our own National Government.

If Congress under the "general-welfare" clause may take charge of the school system of the States, what part of the domestic affairs of the States will be beyond the reach of Congress? What will have become of our boasted right of local self-government? It will be held, what is left of it, at the will of Congress. The States can manage their school system better, more economically, and satisfactorily than it can possibly be done by the National Government. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] said the other day, and most truly, that the States managed with greatly more economy than the General Government, and individuals more economically than the States. The money sought to be used by this bill is to be drawn from the people by taxation; it is not a gift. Let the people tax themselves at home, and then oversee its disbursement, as they will do, instead of having the remote, far-off, and to them almost irresponsible agencies of the National Government to do it, with its attendant extravagance.

A strong appeal is made in behalf of this bill based on the poverty and consequent alleged incapacity of some of the States of the South to deal with the mass of illiteracy precipitated into their citizenship by the results of the war. No Senator can feel the force of this appeal more keenly than I do; not on account of my own State, which is amply able to take care of her own educational interests, but on account of other States in the South. I can not, however, indorse the opinion that any State in the South is financially incapable of doing justice to this subject. It is harder on some to do this than on others, but not one of them is so poor as to be unable to establish and maintain a reasonably efficient system of public free schools, and that they will do their best in that direction I have no doubt.

There is a vast improvement in all the States of the South in the matter of public schools, and this improvement is growing and increasing annually, and will, if let alone, if abandoned to the efforts and self-reliance of the States, eventually come fully up to the requirements of the times. In my judgment no greater mistake can be made than for any of the States to avail themselves of the so-called bounty of the General Government in behalf of the public schools. In proportion to the efforts of the General Government in this behalf a corresponding relaxation of State effort will surely follow, resulting inevitably in the future in a total abandonment of duty in this regard by the States and assumption by the General Government of entire control over the subject.

Believing this bill unconstitutional in principle and vicious as a measure of policy, I shall vote against it. I would willingly vote for a bill granting public lands in aid of education in the States, and believe it would be both wise and just for the General Government to give this aid. Congress can give away the lands. There is no limitation on the power of Congress over the public lands as there is upon the taxing power. No implication of power and jurisdiction over the school systems of the States could arise from the gift to the States of lands such as would inevitably follow the exercise of the taxing power for the same purpose, for I hold it to be unquestionable that the taxing power can only be exercised in behalf of subjects over which Congress has constitutional jurisdiction, and I deny that such jurisdiction exists in Congress over the educational systems of the States.

Senators on this side of the Chamber who favor this bill would be horrified at a proposition that the National Government should take charge of the public schools in all the States, and that the scholastic population, white and black, should be promiscuously mixed and taught together. The power to do this I have not the least doubt would be a perfectly legitimate and logical sequence of the passage of this bill, and while I believe that the enlightenment of this country has reached that point, and the passions and prejudices of the past have subsided to that level, when it is generally considered and appreciated that such a course would be ruinous to the interests of both races in the South, I can not forget that many strange and unlooked-for events have transpired in the last twenty years, and for one I prefer to take no risk.

So far as we can now see, for a long time in the future the negro question will be an active and potent factor in the politics of this country. The colored vote will be sought and the prejudices of the colored man pandered to in the future as in the past and at present. If it be conceded that the power over this subject resides in the National Government, I regard it certain that this would add another element to the various others growing out of the race question to be agitated in the political arena and foment discord and trouble.

The presentation of this bill is one of the many evils growing out of a large surplus revenue. It would never have been thought of, nor would many other extravagant measures now being urged ever have been seriously considered, had our revenues been simply sufficient for the economical support of the Government. A strong admonition is given us in this as in various other measures pending in the two Houses of Congress that the wisest and safest course to pursue is to proceed at once to a reduction of our revenues down to the actual requirements of the Government. I have great respect for the philanthropic motives as well as admiration for the ability and zeal and energy of the Senator in charge of this bill [Mr. BLAIR], but am compelled by convictions of duty to oppose it.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, it was my intention originally to have said not a word on this bill. There was no particular call for it from the State which I represent, and it was looked upon as a voluntary offering upon the part of the people of the North to do something toward the education of those people upon whom they had conferred suddenly the rights of citizenship. But the strange course of the debate has induced me, having made up my mind to support the bill, to say a few words by way of giving my reasons for that action.

There are some things that can not be denied in connection with this matter. It is true that the people of the North set free the colored people in the South. It is true that they not only freed them without any preparation for their new state, but that they conferred upon them the highest rights of an American citizen. It is true that they enforced those rights by constitutional amendments, by various penal acts passed, as was supposed, in pursuance thereof, and even when constitutional amendments and penal acts were not of sufficient avail they forced the colored people into positions of equality if not superiority with the white people of the South by the use of the bayonet.

When those rights were conferred upon the colored people in the South our friends who did it knew very well what it meant. They knew that it meant a dilution of or an infusion into the right of suffrage of a vast element of ignorance and vice, of a vast community of people of a different race from those among whom they lived, utterly and absolutely unfitted for the duties which were imposed upon them; they knew that that meant also a surrender of several of the States of the South to the absolute control of this colored majority, and they knew that it meant also not only that surrender but it meant the actual endangering of all the institutions which the white people of the South had built up, and even, in their opinion, of their civilization itself.

Suffering thus for twenty years, or nearly so, all the inconveniences that have attended this state of things in the South, we were told to be patient, that the great panacea for all the evils of misgovernment in a free country was education, that upon the virtue and intelligence of the people depended the preservation and the perpetuity of our free institutions. But when we were told that, and exhorted to patience, it was known to our friends on the other side likewise that we were unable to impart that education to those people; that in the struggle which set them free and in the subsequent eras of carpet-bagism and rapine we were so impoverished and so destroyed financially that we were absolutely unable to so tax ourselves as to impart the blessings of education to those people. That was also well known.

Now, what were we to do? We did the best that we could under the circumstances. I speak particularly for North Carolina, and I believe that her case is a fair representation of all the Southern States. We reorganized our systems of public schools and we replaced as far as we could the invested funds upon which they had been supported, and we levied as much taxation as we could possibly bear for the purpose of affording the means of education; but they were, and are still, lamentably insufficient.

It may redound somewhat to the credit of my State, as little as we have done in the way of education, to say that the annual taxation there for the support of public schools, in which the colored people equally participate, is $25,000 per annum more than the whole taxation levied for the support of the State government. If any other States exceed that, they are doing better than we are. In fact, as I am told, some States in the South are doing more, and are levying double the amount of taxation for school purposes that is levied for the general expenses of the State governments.

At the same time that we were thus suffering under the evils of poverty and this infliction of the infusion of ignorance and vice into the suffrage and into the management of our affairs, we were held by the people of the North to the same rigid accountability for our public conduct as was exacted from the most highly educated communities of the American continent; from the best established communities, and whose institutions for a hundred years had not been disturbed, much less overthrown, by any social or political revolution; and upon the slightest pretense you investigated us, and continue to investigate us, notwithstanding you say that the evils under which we suffered and all evils in government originate from the want of sufficient education of the masses.

After this state of things has endured for nearly twenty years, at last a portion of the people of the North through their representatives in Congress awoke to their duty. One honorable Senator in this body at least bethought him of the panacea, and he brings in this bill to distribute $15,000,000 the first year, $14,000,000 the second year, and so on decreasing $1,000,000 annually for ten years, among the States of the Union in proportion to illiteracy for the purpose of removing the great evil under which the people of the South have suffered.

What does that bill propose to do? It proposes, so far as I have been able to examine, nothing in the world conflicting with the rights and sovereignties of the States, as I understand it. It gives aid to their schools for ten years. The fund is to be expended altogether under State control, in aid of systems of education already established by the States; and, so far as I have been able to investigate the taxation systems of the several Southern States, it will not cause one dollar's increase in taxation in order to bring those States within the reach of the benefits of this act. I know that it will not in my State cause a dollar of increase.

What are the objections to the bill and where do they come from? It was natural to suppose that from the strict construction side of the Chamber there would be some objection to the bill in regard to its constitutionality, but I was not prepared to see that question raised by gentlemen from the other side of the Chamber; and I especially was not prepared to see it raised by those who ask for money for every conceivable subject on this floor. I was not prepared to see it raised by those who ask for money to enable the Government of the United States to go into a Territory and doctor a sick cow. I did not expect that. I have as much sympathy for the suffering cattle of Kansas as any man on this floor. I have heard of the disease that infects that indispensable animal so necessary to our rotundity and our strength. I had heard of the agonies they suffer, from the tender fledgeling of a calf to the great bovine mammoth that bellows upon the grassy plains, until I had wished to exclaim, Oh, that my head were as waters, and mine eyes were a fountain of tears, that I might weep for the afflictions of a Kansas calf. [Laughter.]

It may be owing to my imperfect legal education or to the obtuseness of my faculties, but I can not see the difference between educating a child and doctoring a steer. It seems that while the proper solution of the problem of the relation of virtue and intelligence to the maintenance and perpetuity of free institutions is a simple one and may be safely and properly left to the States, yet that the diagnosis of an ailing calf rises at once into national dignity and towers over the educational question like Jumbo over a narrow-gauge mule, or a cedar of Lebanon over a chincapin bush. [Laughter.] I confess to my inability to see this want of distinction.

Our friends in the valley of the Mississippi object to it, many of them. It is lawful, they say, to give money to the Mississippi Valley on any and every occasion and pretext. The Mississippi must have money when its waters are too low; it must have money when its waters are too high. They must have money not only to scour out the channel, but to build levees along the banks to keep the plantations from overflow. It is a lawful stream; it must always have money. But while you must protect the farmer's cotton plantation along the bank of the Mississippi, it would make the bones of Thomas Jefferson and Chief-Justice Marshall turn over in their graves if there is any proposition to educate the child who lives in the swamp that is to be reclaimed, in order to fit him for citizenship. It is lawful, some say, to build a railroad across the Isthmus of Panama, in a foreign country, but it is not lawful, it is absolutely and utterly unconstitutional, to appropriate money to fit men for citizenship.

I admit that the present circumstances are abnormal and exceptional. I admit that there is no special provision in the Constitution or one perhaps looking directly toward it for public education; but the men who framed that Constitution had no idea that there would be the great civil war that occurred. They had no idea that 5,000,000 slaves would be liberated by that war, and still less had they any idea that the 5,000,000 slaves would be forced by penal laws, constitutional amendments, or by armies and navies or what not, into an absolute equality of citizenship with the white race who discovered this country, cut down its forests, drove back its aboriginal inhabitants, and made the wilderness to blossom like the rose. They had no idea that their institutions and the work of their hands would ever be committed to ignorant and unlettered Africans for protection and preservation. If they had, I can not doubt from the wisdom which they exhibited in all they did they would have inserted extra provisions in the Constitution providing against such a calamity. I can not doubt it.

Others say that this money ought to be divided according to population and not according to illiteracy. That would be one way of dividing it. If you call it a gift, a charity, certainly it should be bestowed upon those who most need it. If you call it an educational fund, it should certainly be distributed in proportion to the number of those to be educated. It is not the literate but the illiterate who are to be educated, so it seems to me there is no other just way to divide it. Would you have it distributed to the professors of the colleges of the country? Would you have it distributed to members of Congress? Surely you would distribute it if it is for the purposes of education to those who most need it and who are to be educated. It seems to me that is the proper way of dividing it, and no other. You can not divide it according to taxation, and if you distribute according to population you defeat the whole object of the bill.

Others say again that the bill gives too much money. Several Senators have said that. It comes with a bad grace, it seems to me, when those who have already received largely of the benefits of public education or of education paid for by the Government of the United States, come in and make the objection that it gives too much money. By looking at the reports of the gifts of public lands to the various States for purposes of education, as collated in the American Almanac of Mr. Spofford for 1879, I find that the States of the Northwest have received 70,213,534 acres, which at a dollar and a quarter an acre, the Government price, makes $87,765,667, while the States of the South have only received for similar purposes 6,434,446 acres, worth $8,043,000. So the people of the North have received $80,000,000 in property, which is the same as money, for the purpose of educating their children more than the people of the South.

I am informed by those who have made the calculation that the share which will go to the Southern States under the bill in the ten years to come will be about $55,000,000, and that will still fall short $27,000,000 of bringing those Southern States up to an equality with the Northwestern States in the matter of education at public expense. Yet we are told that the bill gives too much money; and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] says the South can not be trusted with it. You might as well refuse to pay a man what you owe him because you could not trust him with the money.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Will the Senator allow me one question? While the Senator is speaking of the bounty of the General Government in the bestowment of public lands for the support of common schools, would it not be well for him in the same category to estimate and draw a balance as to the millions of acres given to the Southern States known as swamp lands, which were probably more valuable than the lands given for common-school purposes? Will he take the seventy-odd million of acres given as swamp lands, and state how many acres of those swamp lands were given to the Southern States?

Mr. VANCE. I went through that whole subject once, but I am not prepared with the statistics now; I will say, however, that the same proportion of inequality which exists in the giving of lands for school purposes between the North and South exists in the giving of it for all other purposes.

Mr. VAN WYCK. If the Senator will allow me, there is the same inequality, only upon the other side. The same inequality in regard to swamp lands which existed in favor of the South has probably existed in the gift of land for public schools in favor of the North. That is the reason why I desire my friend to simply balance up the two gifts.

Mr. VANCE. I do not exactly understand the Senator, I believe, but I mean to make this assertion, which will be borne out by the statistics, that at least five acres for all purposes, railroads, schools, education, and what not, have been given to the Northern States where one has been given to the South.

Another Senator objects because he says the people ought to learn to depend upon themselves. That is a doctrine I like to hear advanced, but I do not think it ought to come from that side of the Chamber. Having received all the public lands that were sufficient to enable them to lay the basis of their school system and make a fund for perpetual education in their States, they then state to the rest of us that we should learn to help ourselves, that it will not do to depend on the Government.

Mr. President, we will help ourselves if you will take your hands off of us. If you will let us alone we will agree to help ourselves. If you will quit taxing us to support your factories in the North we will agree to help ourselves. If you will quit taking public lands to build railroads in the country we will help ourselves. If you will doctor your own sick cows and calves we will help ourselves. It comes with a very bad grace indeed from a portion of the country, where all the fortunes that have been accumulated have been accumulated by making everybody help them by universal taxation for private benefit, to come here when there is a proposition to help the colored people that they themselves thrust into this position, far above their capacity to occupy, and say to us, "Well, you must help yourselves." If that is to be the doctrine all along the line I am perfectly willing; I am more than willing to it. God knows, all that I ask for the people of my section, and all that I ever expect to ask for the people of my section in this respect, is to be let alone. Do not tax us to build up your shoe factories; do not tax us to build up your woolen factories; do not tax us to build up your iron founderies; do not tax us to build up every industry almost that you have got in the North by which you have been enabled to accumulate your wealth, and then turn around and say to us, when we ask for a little help—not for ourselves so much as for those whom you thrust upon us with the right of suffrage—"We will not give it to you; you must learn to depend upon yourselves."

Mr. President, I do not expect this bill to pass; I have no idea that it will pass. I have always doubted, and I say it with proper Senatorial courtesy, the professions of many gentlemen on the other side when they were so interested about the improvement, moral and intellectual, of the colored race in the South. While they would send emissaries among them and band them together for political partisan purposes, and pat them on the back and urge them forward in the name of freedom and advancement, &c., to the polls, I have always believed that when it came to doing something really for the benefit of that people there would be flinching, and I am not disappointed at finding it. When the Senator from Ohio got up and put his refusal to vote for the bill on the ground that he could not trust the people of the South to administer this money, I was prepared for his opposition to be put upon some ground; because I have no doubt that he prefers the ignorant negro as a producer of bloody-shirt and a fruitful source of investigation to the intelligent negro as an intelligent voter at the ballot-box. He answers his purpose, no doubt, better now then he would then.

In reply to the charge—to the assumption rather, for it scarcely amounts to a charge—that the people of the South can not be intrusted to dispose of the money properly, I appeal to the laws of all the Southern States in relation to education in common schools. In the State of North Carolina, as I have explained, there are more than half a million dollars raised annually by taxation, to which is added other funds amounting annually to about $700,000 for distribution, and 95 per cent. of that taxation comes from the pockets of the white people and the men who vote in the party opposed to the party in which the black people are. The report of the superintendent of public schools which I hold in my hand shows that in full proportion to numbers the blacks have reaped the benefits of that taxation of their political opponents; and as our laws, in conformity with the Constitution of the United States, forbid any discrimination, there is no more likelihood that any of this money will be improperly appropriated and that the whites will get the benefit of it instead of the blacks than there is that any such political dishonesty will be committed in any other State or community in the Union.

So far from there being a prejudice in North Carolina against the education of the black people, as the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] disclaimed as to his State, there is a positive desire for it. The intelligent tax-payers of North Carolina desire that if these men are to have the rights of suffrage and of citizenship they shall be sufficiently intelligent to exercise those rights properly and safely to the community. They desire that their workmen shall have sufficient tools. There is a prejudice there, I confess, against the education of the two races together in the same school-houses and upon the same benches. The law provides that that shall not be done. There is not a prejudice but a dislike there to being taxed so heavily in the midst of their poverty, when scarcely able to educate their own children, for the education of the children of those who have been thrust in among them in the manner which I have described. It is grievous to the people of North Carolina to pay so heavy a tax for that purpose; but still they do it, and they impose it upon themselves. It is not the machinery of party that forces it upon them. The Legislature of that State has been Democratic and under the control of white men for years and years, and every year the taxes imposed for public education have become higher and higher.

So, as the bill violates none of the laws of North Carolina, as it proposes to interfere with no part of the system of education of North Carolina, but simply to aid it, and as it is to endure for an experimental time and not for all time, I feel that it is my duty to vote for the bill; and I shall do so.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I congratulate the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] upon the very politic and sagacious speech that he has made, upon the very adroit and dexterous appeal that he has addressed to Northern sentiment in behalf of this measure. He assures us at the outset that North Carolina is not in the attitude of a suppliant; that North Carolina does not desire the benefactions of the National Government; that she is competent to administer her own affairs, and that she takes care of the interests of education within her own domains; but he advises us that as a gratuity, as a benefaction from the North in reparation of the wrongs that were done by the North in suppressing the rebellion, in freeing the slaves, and enforcing the rights of the slaves after they were freed upon the people of North Carolina who were in rebellion, he is willing to accept for that State the amount to which it would be entitled under the bill, and that therefore he acquiesces in the measure that is now before the Senate.

It is a gratifying commentary upon the Senator's speech that it is shown by the census tables that the percentage of illiteracy, not among the blacks of North Carolina but among the whites of North Carolina, reaches the aggregate of nearly 32 per cent. of the entire white population. Nearly one in three of the white people of that State, that is willing to accept from an aggressive and tyrannical North its proportion of $105,000,000 for purposes of education in the eleven States of the South where the rebellion occurred, can neither read nor write the ballot that is deposited in the ballot-box on election day. The whites of North Carolina need this money more than the blacks do. I can say to that Senator that the enfranchised slaves of North Carolina make a much more commendable showing, so far as education is concerned, than do the whites of that one of the old thirteen original colonies.

When the Senator draws attention to the fact that in the discussion of this bill some objection was made from some quarter, from those who had supported an appropriation as he so gracefully says for the sick calves on the plains of the West, he is unable to perceive that there is no similarity whatever between that measure and the one that is now proposed before the Senate. In the bill that proposed an appropriation in regard to the diseases of cattle there was not a proposition to turn over a cent to the treasuries of the States where the money was to be expended. On the contrary, it was provided that the entire amount was to be used by the Commissioner of Agriculture, an officer of the National Government, to be distributed in the different States wherever the disease might exist; and because any Senator who supported that bill thinks there are some objections to supporting a measure like this which provides simply for the turning over of this money to the hands of the authorities of the States that for twenty years have made so few appropriations, have cared so little about the education, not alone of the blacks who were enfranchised and who have been released into the great body of citizenship as he tells us, but also of the whites, so that twenty years after the close of the war one in three of the white people is not able to read and write, he deems that there is inconsistency which deserves attention!

The people of North Carolina are not ignorant because they are poor; they are poor because they are ignorant. Two centuries ago, the founders of that alleged civilization saw fit to adopt as the basis of their social and political structure a system of ignorant and servile labor, and to the success of that experiment they devoted a great area of territory that had a soil of great fertility, that possessed a salubrious climate, that had seacoasts and harbors that invited commerce, navigable rivers and water-powers and forests which suggested manufacture, great possibilities of wealth in agriculture, all the elements of prosperity and power. They belonged politically to that organization which for generations controlled the resources and directed the policy of the General Government, and after nearly a century of national life that Commonwealth finds itself with its industries prostrate, with its resources undeveloped, with its slaves free, with 32 per cent. of its white population unable to read and write, and is not, as he says, extending its hands for alms, but is willing to accept as a gratuity, a benefaction or bounty from the Treasury of that Government which with its associates it endeavored to destroy; and we who favor a system that shall be just, that shall be generous, that shall deal with this question upon broad national grounds, are taunted here and told that the people of North Carolina are capable of attending to their own affairs, and that if the people of the North will take their hands off from that prostrate Commonwealth they will be amply able to take care of themselves. The people of the North have long since taken their hands and their feet from that prostrate Commonwealth, and when the Senator from North Carolina endeavors to convey the impression that the North, or any portion of the North, or any State of the North, is interfering with the affairs of North Carolina, tyrannizing over North Carolina, has its foot or its hand upon the neck of North Carolina, he makes a statement that the facts do not warrant and that history will not justify.

It has been too often said in this Chamber that this is a kind of reparation that the North is called upon to make for the great sin of enfranchising the slaves; that because the blacks were made citizens, therefore we of the North are bound to educate them and fit them for citizenship. There are some interesting statistics in connection with this business to which I propose for a few moments to call the attention of the Senate.

Mr. VANCE. Will the Senator allow me just a moment?

Mr. INGALLS. With the greatest pleasure.

Mr. VANCE. I will ask him as a candid man if the circumstances under which the slaves were liberated in the South, and under which citizenship was conferred upon them, do not make it his duty to do something to educate them and fit them for that citizenship.

Mr. INGALLS. I do; but no more than it does the people of the States where they exist, who have had their services for two centuries, who made them ignorant, who made it a crime to teach them to read the Bible. I think that there are some obligations resting on the communities where those slaves existed, where they were held in violation of every instinct of humanity.

Mr. VANCE. Will the Senator allow me to say to him that if he would go a little further back there might be some obligation resting upon those who brought them to this country and introduced them as slaves?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. VANCE. And sold them to us and guaranteed the title and then set them free, and thanked God that they were not as other men.

Mr. INGALLS. We have heard all this before. I believe history records that the earliest importation of Africans was in 1607, upon the peninsula of Virginia; and while it may be true that centuries ago those who lived in the North were to a certain extent responsible for this evil, yet to bring that in at this age of the world's history, to declare after the great revolution that has occurred that because those people, 4,000,000 of them, who were held in the States of the South and who were enfranchised as the result of the war, in which the people of the South declared that they acquiesced—that in consequence of that the whole burden of removing the great evil of illiteracy rests upon the North is an absurdity which I did not suppose even the Senator from North Carolina would advocate.

In regard to this question of poverty, I should like to inquire whether a black man is not worth as much to a community when he is free as when he is a slave? What is all this profusion of protestation about the great wrong done to the South by the freeing of the slaves and the destruction of slave property? Were the slaves deported? Is a man worth any less when he is free than when he is owned by somebody else? Because the ownership of a man is transferred from another human being to himself, is the community robbed by the amount of his value in the market as a chattel? I say all this talk about the losses of the South, about the great poverty inflicted upon the South by the enfranchisement of the slave, is without foundation. The South is better off with the slaves free than she was when they were enchained. Her productions are greater; her possibilities of future development are infinitely greater; and there is not an intelligent and thoughtful and candid man upon that side of the Chamber who will not admit, when he is privately interrogated, that slavery was a great burden economically upon the people; and I have never heard one man say he desired that the institution of slavery should be restored.

What, then, is the meaning of the assertion that because the slaves were enfranchised the South was impoverished? The South was enriched by the enfranchisement of the slaves. The slaves were a great burden upon the resources of the South. Yet whenever this question comes up the argument by which we are assailed is that in consequence of this act of national beneficence, an act of kindness and of advantage to the South, we are to be called upon to educate the men who were kept for centuries in ignorance and at last made free as the result of the punishment of a great national crime.

I said when the Senator from North Carolina rose to interrupt me that there are some interesting statistics bearing upon this subject to which I would ask the attention of the Senate for a moment. I will premise my observations by saying that in my judgment the necessity for this bill rests in the illiteracy of the whites of the South. I do not support this measure or any kindred measure upon the assertion that we are under obligation to educate the blacks of the South, for they are getting along very well. They have had but about twenty years in which to try this experiment, and for that lapse of time the percentage of illiteracy among the blacks is a great deal less, compared with the time they have had to become intelligent than that which exists among the whites.

Let us look at Alabama, for instance, which comes first on the list. There is a population in Alabama of 851,780 ten years of age and over. The number of white illiterates ten years of age and over, not belonging to this despised and degraded class of enfranchised slaves but belonging to the ruling class, to the predominant race, is 111,767, or 24.7 per cent., as contrasted with the general average of 2 and 3 among the communities of the North, black, white, and foreign together. Next comes Arkansas. The Senator from that State has assured us that they have also been subjected to great dangers, perils, and difficulties as one of the consequences of the war by the enfranchisement of the blacks.

Mr. GARLAND. I did not put it upon that ground solely; I put it upon various grounds.

Mr. INGALLS. I understood that.

Mr. GARLAND. The blame for which I said I laid at nobody's door.

Mr. INGALLS. So I understood the Senator; I did not misapprehend him; but he did make, as one of the grounds of his argument, if I understood him correctly, the presence of this illiterate black population. There were in the census period in 1880 in Arkansas 531,876 ten years of age and over. There were of white illiterates ten years of age and over 98,542, or exactly 25 per cent. of the white inhabitants of Arkansas who can neither read nor write; one out of every four. In Florida the percentage is 19.9, or nearly one-fifth of the entire white population. In Georgia, which is understood to be one of the most advanced and progressive of the Southern States, the percentage is within a fraction of 23. In Kentucky, which I believe was on both sides of the controversy, and therefore was not specially exposed to the evils which have been complained of, the percentage is 22; in Louisiana, 18.4; in Mississippi, 16.3; in North Carolina, 31.5; in South Carolina, 21.9; in Tennessee, 27.3; in Texas, 15.3; in Virginia, 18.2.

In the face of the repetition of these figures, in the face of the fact that on an average from one in three to one in five of the white people in the communities where this money is to be most largely expended, who do the voting and transact the business and assume to themselves the exercise of the entire political power, can neither read nor write, we are told that this is a question devolving duties upon the people of the North in consequence of the enfranchisement of the slaves, of the presence of the colored population, which should be instructed. The fact of it is, as I have before intimated, this is a radical difficulty existing from the foundation of Southern society. It arises from the facts of their original constitution, and we are called upon to address ourselves to the solution of this problem as one that exists among the Caucasians and not among the Ethiopians.

The pending question, I believe, is upon the amendment that is proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MILLER, of California, in the chair). The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. INGALLS. As I believe there was an order to print the bill with the amendments as they were proposed, I will ask the Secretary to read the amendment that is now before the Senate for its action.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 8, line 6, after the word "provided," it is proposed to strike out the remainder of the section and to insert:

That no greater part of the money appropriated under this act shall be paid out to any State or Territory in any one year than the sum expended out of its own revenues in the preceding year for the maintenance of common schools, not including the sums expended in the erection of school buildings.

Mr. INGALLS. Do I understand that the Senator from New Hampshire accepts that as the action of the committee upon the bill?

Mr. BLAIR. No. I can state the exact condition of the case. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] moved to amend the eighth section by striking out the words which compelled the raising of at least one-third as much by the State as it shall receive from the General Government during the first five years and substituting for those words the words "an amount equal to;" so that the State would be obliged to raise as much as she received under the apportionment of the $15,000,000 upon the basis of illiteracy throughout the country. To that amendment the Senator from Indiana moved another, striking out the words preceding those that I have mentioned, commencing at the word "provided," in line 6, striking out the rest of the section and substituting for all that is in the section in reference to what shall be paid, to wit, one-third the first five years and then an equal amount the second five years, a provision that the State shall receive from the General Government as much as it raises and expends for the running expenses of schools, not including what it pays out for school-houses; and this amendment of the Senator from Indiana to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas is the pending question.

Mr. INGALLS. That is designed, I suppose, by the mover to relieve the section from the obvious complications that were apparent, I believe, to the Senator from New Hampshire to a certain degree when the bill was last under consideration.

Mr. BLAIR. That is a matter that we have been over. The Senator from New Hampshire does not concede that there is any complexity or difficulty whatever about the grammatical phraseology or structure of the section. It was misunderstood by other Senators, and the section was supposed to relate to the payment from the General Government to the States, whereas it relates to the payment out by the States of the money after they have received the apportionment into their own treasuries. That, coming not from perhaps too great familiarity with the other sections of the bill, is the reason of the difficulty and misunderstanding. But this amendment of the Senator from Indiana is a radical amendment touching the distribution, and providing, irrespective of what is to be found in any other part of the bill, that the State shall pay out only so much money as she actually raises for the running expenses of the schools.

Mr. INGALLS. Then I understand the Senator from New Hampshire to adhere to the phraseology and language of the entire section as it came from the committee and that he is opposed to any amendment to the section.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] suggested a verbal amendment dividing a sentence, inserting a period and starting off with a new sentence, which relieved the section from any conceivable ambiguity, leaving the meaning as before.

Mr. INGALLS. What was that?

Mr. BLAIR. That I propose to accept so far as I can do so.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator point out the amendment?

Mr. BLAIR. I will give the Senator the amendment itself.

Mr. INGALLS. I had hoped, Mr. President, that, in view of the difficulties which to my mind are involved in this section, the Senator from New Hampshire would be willing to adopt the modifications that have been suggested, because of course, unless that is done, many who believe that the section as it stands would be inoperative would be unable to give any support to the measure at all.

Mr. BLAIR. The amendments are all pending and when they come to be read I think there will be no difficulty in understanding the section, and it will become a decision of the Senate upon different ideas, and, of course, every Senator will vote as he thinks he ought to vote.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Kansas will allow me. As I understand the Senator from New Hampshire, who is in charge of the bill, he proposes so to amend section 8 as to make it clear that the distribution of money referred to in this section is not a distribution by the General Government to the States, but the disbursement of the money by the States after it has gone into the State treasury.

Mr. INGALLS. That is, he intends to provide for that disbursement by State officers.

Mr. HARRISON. Exactly.

Mr. INGALLS. Under what power of the Government, unless State rights are entirely swept away, does he propose to exercise that authority?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know; and that is exactly the trouble. If it is intended that certain action in the way of local taxation and the appropriation and expenditure of money for public schools by the States shall be a condition of their enjoying this appropriation out of the national Treasury, then we ought to guarantee that by retaining the money in the national Treasury. I do not know what the effect of this bill will be if the money was once turned over to the States and went into the State treasuries; and therefore I suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire who has the bill in charge that he do not insist upon this provision, but allow the section to be so amended that if the States do not comply with these conditions which he endeavors to put upon them the money shall remain in the national Treasury, and not attempt to follow it after we have dispossessed ourselves of any control over it, and put limitations upon the use of it, because we go on putting into the State treasury, or it is there, and we have lost control of it. And if the State does not make its own appropriation for school purposes, what good does it do us that we keep the money in the State treasury and prevent its use for any purpose?

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, I will state the provisions of the bill again in this regard. In an earlier section we begin with the money in the national Treasury, $15,000,000, and with a law which requires its apportionment among the several States in proportion to the illiteracy existing in those States. That apportionment or allotment being made, the money being still in the national Treasury, it can never be used by the State until the money is in the possession of the State. Thereupon it is provided that on or before the 1st day of September the money for the first year shall be paid over to the State practically at the commencement of the school year. It is then provided that at the expiration of that year, on or before the last day of June, the close of our fiscal year following, the State shall render an account or a report of what she has done with this money, this first year's installment; and here is a condition imposed in this section, that during that year when she has spent this first installment she shall also expend of her own money one-third as much as she receives from the General Government. These two expenditures become one expenditure, a portion of that expenditure derived from the National Government and the remainder from the State government, all disbursed for one common purpose, the maintenance of the common schools of the State during that particular first year. A report to the National Government must be made, or there never will be any further allotment or payment to the State at all. Unless that report at the end of the first year shows that the State has paid one-third as much as she has received from the national fund during the first year, she gets no more. That is what this section provides, and that is all that it provides.

During the second five years the condition is that she must have paid as much as she has received during any one of the five years in order to get the apportionment paid to her for her own purposes for handling the next year. There is no other theory on which the bill can be worked at all so far as I can understand or judge. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts wants to amend this verbally in such a way as to provide that in any given year there shall be no more paid to the State unless she shows that in the year preceding she shall have paid out one-third as much as she has received from the General Government. That is what the bill already is. He thinks it will be clearer to split the sentence in two, put in a period, and insert some additional words. I am perfectly willing that shall be done if he sees it more clearly; but the committee went over the matter very carefully, and we thought it was as explicit as it need be as we reported it to the Senate. I care nothing about phraseology if I can get the substance, and as Senators seemed to be in a fog, I assented to the verbal amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

When we explained the matter the other day the Senator from Indiana said then he would modify his amendment, and he accordingly did so by substituting one or two other words, so that his amendment is one that provides, if it is adopted, that there shall be no payment in any case from the National Government to the State beyond the amount the State herself expends, and he compares the year preceding with the year existing, which will make it very difficult to start the first year.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, I desired to get the floor while the matter was warm in order to reply to a few remarks that fell from the Senator from Kansas, whom I do not now see in his seat. However, I will proceed anyhow. [Mr. INGALLS entered the Hall and took his seat.]

The Senator went back to argue the whole question of slavery and delivered a tirade upon the efforts of the Southern States to keep the black man in bondage, and so on and so on. That was familiar ground to him, and I have no doubt that it came to him with many associations and recollections that enabled him to bristle up and to speak with fluency and with zeal. I do not go into that. I had said nothing that could lead him to suppose that I was after repeating that matter. That was a matter of history, and it has gone by, and I have nothing to say about it. I argued simply that it was the duty of those who thrust the colored people into these positions of responsibility that they were unfitted for to do something out of the public Treasury by their votes to fit them for those duties. That was all I argued. His reply to that is that the white people of the South need it more than the colored.

I deny that, sir. As poor as the white people of the South are, if they were not burdened with the care and education of this vast number of men who are not only ignorant but without property to be taxed, the South could provide sufficiently for its own education, and I said that I did not ask this bill to be passed into a law for the benefit of those white people; I asked it for the benefit of the colored people whom the white tax-payers were not able to properly educate, and notwithstanding that the bill is irrespective of race, we all know that the colored man is the meritorious cause of action in this bill and that it is intended chiefly for his benefit.

Now, sir, the people of my country are twitted with gross ignorance and poverty, and the Senator was good enough to say that they were not ignorant because they were poor but they were poor because they were ignorant. I want to say to that Senator that this bill is not a bounty from him, that this bill is not a bounty and a gift on the part of the North; that, as I understand it, it is to come out of the revenues of the whole country, into which revenues the poor State of North Carolina pays twelve times as much money as the rich State of Kansas that has already been provided for in the way of education by a gift of public lands. I hold in my hand the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in which I find that the total amount of revenue paid to the Government under the internal-revenue laws by the State of Kansas is $239,762, while the total amount paid by the State of North Carolina into the fund of the Government is $2,372,226.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Senator allow me to ask him how much of that is paid on distilled spirits?

Mr. VANCE. About one-half of it was paid on distilled spirits which I understand were drunk mostly in prohibition Kansas. [Laughter.]

Mr. PLUMB. I am pretty sure that the prohibition people of Kansas, then, are greatly obliged to the people of North Carolina for paying taxes on the distilled spirits they drink. [Laughter.]

Mr. VANCE. Certainly.

Mr. PLUMB. That I understand is the statement of the Senator?

Mr. VANCE. But now it is not possible, we have no statistics that would enable us to get at the amount of tariff taxation paid by each State, but as the population of North Carolina is greater than that of Kansas, I believe, somewhat, is it not?

Mr. PLUMB. Yes, greater.

Mr. VANCE. The presumption is that the amount of goods consumed in North Carolina is quite as great as it is in Kansas, and that, therefore, we pay quite as much tariff taxation into the Treasury of the United States as does the State of Kansas, and we pay twelve times as much internal revenue. I think that is a sufficient answer to the suggestion that this is a matter of charity to the poor white people of the South. We only ask you, Mr. President, of the North to pass a bill aiding us in taking care of that element in our midst which you placed there with the right of citizenship in its hands and which is not fit for it. That is all we ask. I would never think of coming here to ask for aid to the State of North Carolina if the condition of things there was what it used to be before the war, or if even now the black element in government was obliterated partially. We can easily educate our people ourselves or we can let them go without education. We are responsible for the education of the people if it is necessary to the preservation of our liberties and our free institutions. That is the position I take about this bill, sir.

I believe that is all I have to say.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina states that if it were not for the negro population having been made free and thrust into their society as a disturbing and pauperizing element they could educate their own people in North Carolina or leave them without education as they preferred. I have only one observation to make, and that is this: I have before me the census tables of 1850. They are very inaccurate, and I am not able to ascertain fully the details of the civilization of North Carolina thirty years ago when there was no black citizenship, when the colored man was a slave, when those colored men who were there were owned by the whites, and when an average adult Ethiopian was worth at least a thousand dollars. It appears that at that time, in those halcyon days, before the North had imposed its aggressive policies upon the unfortunate South, there were a total of whites in North Carolina, male and female, of all ages, 553,028. The number of adults in that population is not given. This aggregate includes all those of school age, which I suppose would have been at least one-third of the entire population. It appears by table nine of this census that at that time there were of adults in the State beyond the school age who could neither read nor write 80,423 whites, which was a larger percentage of illiterate population among the whites in 1850 when the negroes were slaves than exists to-day when the negroes are free.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, I wish we could get back to the real purpose of this bill. I understood when it was introduced here that its object was to make an appropriation which should be apportioned among the States for the education of the children without respect to color. It is of very little consequence to those children what the illiteracy of the several States amounts to in percentage. It is of very little consequence whether North Carolina asks for this or whether Kansas asks for it. We have come here, I understand, to pass this bill, if at all, in order to appropriate money to educate the children of the States. I do not come as a beggar, as the Senator from North Carolina says; neither do I come here to say that I am unwilling to receive it on any terms. I care not what terms you may impose; there can not be any dishonorable terms accompanying a proposition of this sort.

Why, sir, I have grown up in a community where the women meet together and quilt and knit and sew, and the children go around and beg garments (if you choose to call it begging, in the language of the Senator from North Carolina), gather together their pennies and half-dimes and dimes to send off for the purpose of educating the little negroes in Africa. That is not called begging, even though my child or yours may go around asking for contributions. That which the Senator from North Carolina calls begging for alms is deemed praiseworthy where the purpose of the collection is to educate the heathen so that they may understand the great doctrine of Christ's divinity and the salvation of souls. Everybody says that is all right. If it be all right to do these things, why should we stand here and discuss politics on an educational bill? Is it not time for us to vote? Do you ask the illiterate child that comes around for a half-dime for a missionary society whether the politics of its father are Democratic or Republican?

Sir, the question is, whether this Government is able to make this appropriation; whether it is constitutional to make it; and whether it is promotive of the general welfare to do it. Sir, if we had had no education we should have had no Constitution, we should have had no republic, and no republican institutions.

I say therefore (and it is the only speech I have to make), that we should eliminate politics from this matter and determine the question here and now whether this Government is able to assist in this matter of general education. If it is able, then say whether it has the constitutional power, and I believe that is generally conceded. Then I ask Senators to eliminate politics from this discussion, and to vote for or against this appropriation as according to their judgment is right and proper.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, crimination and recrimination in regard to the institution of slavery can not settle satisfactorily the merits of the measure now before the Senate and ought not to determine its fate. I shall vote against this bill, but not for the reasons given by the Senator from Kansas.

One of the darkest pages—one to which I do not care to allude except when the duty is imposed upon me as a former slaveholder, unfortunately for myself—one of the darkest pages in the history of the American people is that upon which was written that infamous bargain between the people of New England and the people of North and South Carolina and Georgia by which the slave trade was continued until 1800 and up to 1808 in consideration of the navigation laws being continued to the New England States. Virginia—and it is the very irony of fate—Virginia protested, with tears and entreaties almost, against that infamous compromise, as it was termed at the time. Mr. Mason denounced slavery, and said that Virginia begged New England and the Southern States not to force it upon her. Mr. Madison used the same language, and denounced the slave trade as an infernal and infamous traffic; and yet through avarice and greed the people of New England determined to keep open the African slave trade in order to trade for molasses and rum and to carry on a traffic which produced the largest profit to them. It was the people of New England and of North and South Carolina and of Georgia who forced slavery upon Maryland and upon Virginia, and afterward the fields of Virginia were devastated and the best blood upon her soil was poured out in remonstrance against the outrage and injustice of having her people destroyed and their homes desolated for an institution against which she originally protested. Sir, this institution which has made ignorance among the whites, according to the Senator from Kansas, and has given the suffrage to the ignorant blacks, came from both sections, and if there is responsibility for it, it is upon both peoples alike. How does it profit us now to go back to the memories of an institution that has passed away, is gone forever?

But I rose simply to protest against that sort of political philosophy or that sort of declamation which holds either section in this country responsible for this institution that went out in the best blood of those who fought on the respective sides for or against it. While I deprecate this sort of discussion, that can possibly do no good, I must protest against the assertion here made, particularly by the Senator from Arkansas in defense of this bill, that he finds a parallel for this legislation in the grant of lands to the Western States, particularly in aid of education. I do not purpose, as I said the other day, to discuss the constitutional question as to where the constitutional power comes from to aid education in the States. If it comes from any clause in the Constitution, it comes from the clause in regard to the general welfare. It can never come, as the Senator from Florida on my right said, from the general justice of educating slaves because they were emancipated by the Federal Government. It must come, as I hold and the school of politics to which I belong, from some express grant in the Constitution or one necessarily to be implied from an express grant; and if it comes at all it comes from that clause in regard to the general welfare; but whether it comes from one clause or another I do not propose now to discuss.

But I do deny absolutely and I defy any Senator here to bring me a precedent for any action of the Federal Government similar to that contained in the bill now before the Senate. While the sixteenth section in each township was granted of the public lands to the different States of the West, including my own State, it was left absolutely, illimitably to the people of the State of Missouri and of the other States to determine what educational system should be adopted and how the grant or liberality of the General Government should be applied. Never before was any bill seriously attempted to be passed in the Congress of the United States in which the Federal Government undertook to prescribe what should be done in the different schools and made the States responsible to the General Government for the distribution of the fund.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him to call his attention to the fact that the acts of admission of the several States in which were contained grants of land for school purposes made those grants upon the distinct recognition of the right of the States to tax lands, and made an agreement with the States in consideration of the grant of land that they would not tax the remainder of the public domain?

Mr. VEST. Certainly. The Senator from Arkansas said that he would not notice the quibble that there was a difference between money and land when distributed and given by the General Government, and yet the Supreme Court of the United States has just delivered a decision in the 5 per cent. cases in which they hold that when the General Government sold the land for money the 5 per cent. was due the States, but when the General Government sold it for land-warrants then the 5 per cent. was not due the States.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I should like to ask the Senator whether in the distribution of what was called the land-scrip fund a few years ago conditions were not annexed, and whether any State refused to receive that land-scrip fund because of the conditions annexed?

Mr. VEST. No conditions ever were annexed such as are found in this bill. No conditions (and I state it emphatically and distinctly) were ever annexed before to any grant by the General Government that certain branches of education should be taught in the schools of the State, that no school-houses should be built out of the money, that the General Government required an exact account every year or every five years of how the money was expended, and if it was not expended according to the will of the General Government then a forfeiture of the grant should be made as to the State in default. Will the Senator find it? It is not upon the statute-book of the United States, and there is no parallel for any such legislation.

Mr. President, the subject of education was given by the framers of the Constitution to the States. I take it that no Senator will rise on either side of the Chamber and state otherwise. It was given to the States and the question of what should be taught in the schools was given to the States.

In this debate we have heard over and over again, and it is the great argument of the advocates of the bill, that illiterate suffrage must be removed, because it endangers the Government. The Constitution of the United States in the very beginning prescribed that in voting for members of the House of Representatives in Congress the voters shall have the same qualifications as the voters for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. Who, then, is to prescribe the qualifications of suffrage? Is it the General Government? It is the State, because the qualifications for voters for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature regulate the qualifications of voters for the Congress of the United States, showing absolutely and beyond question that this whole matter was remitted to the people of the States and to the people of the States alone.

I am not discussing, mark you, the question as to whether the General Government can not give to the States assistance, aid the States. Chief Justice Marshall decided in regard to the quarantine laws that the Federal officers might go and assist the officers of the State in carrying out the quarantine laws of the State. I am not saying that the General Government can not aid the people of the States in the matter of education; but I do say that the General Government has no right to go down and prescribe the details of the system of education in the State. While they may give to the respective States the means with which to educate their people, the mode of education, the instrumentalities of education, must be left under the Constitution to the States alone. That, as I understand it, is the doctrine of the Constitution and of the men who made it.

Now, let us look at this bill and see whether, as the Senator from Arkansas says, it allows the States to control their system of education according to their own pleasure and will. I assert here, and I defy the Senator who advocates this bill to answer the proposition on the face of it, I assert that from the fifth section, with the exception of the sixth and seventh sections, down to the close, the Federal Government alone controls the education in the respective States to whom this grant of money is made. Now, let us look at it without rhetoric and without declamation. Take the fifth section. The fifth section of this bill provides that—

> The instruction in the common schools wherein these moneys shall be expended shall include the art of reading, writing, and speaking the English language, arithmetic, geography, history of the United States, and such other branches of useful knowledge as may be taught under local laws.

There the General Government prescribes what shall be taught. Suppose the State does not choose to teach one of these branches?

Mr. BLAIR. Will it trouble the Senator if I interrupt him?

Mr. VEST. Oh, no.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator would read with the same emphasis the last clause as he did the others, I think he would see that the whole matter is remitted to local law.

Mr. VEST. I will read it again.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask another question. If it may be made absolute can it not be made conditional and then accepted or rejected as the State sees fit? Is not this a gift annually, and if the State chooses not to take it the second year she is not obliged to take it.

Mr. VEST. Ah, that is begging the question. Here this money is to be distributed to the respective States and certain things are to be done with the money. What does this mean except that the schools in the respective States shall teach such and such branches:

That the instruction in the common schools wherein these moneys shall be expended shall include the art of reading, writing, and speaking the English language, arithmetic, geography, history of the United States—and such other branches of useful knowledge as may be taught under local laws.

There are certain requisites which must be complied with—

But these branches must be taught, and if the State sees proper to add anything else ex gratia the State can do so, but here is the prerequisite. In other words, the Federal Government says, "We take hold of the schools of the respective States; you shall teach these branches which we prescribe, if you take the money at all." If that is not the meaning of it, then I am absolutely at fault in regard to the construction of this sentence and the words themselves.

Not content with saying these branches shall be taught—and shall include, whenever practicable, instruction in the arts of industry, and the instruction of females in such branches of technical or industrial education as are suited to their sex, which instruction shall be free to all, without distinction of race, color, nativity, or condition in life: Provided, That nothing herein shall deprive children of different races, &c.

Now suppose a State does not see proper to teach an industrial school, as a great many of the States do not see proper to do it; suppose a State does not see proper to educate women in these technical arts, as great many States do not see proper to do it; what right has the Federal Government to say by this bill, not one of the provisions of which would be under the control of the States, "You shall teach certain things, and if you do not, not one dollar of this national bounty shall go to your people?"

But again, the eighth section of the bill (I said the sixth and seventh were not amenable to this objection) declares:

That the design of this act not being to establish an independent system of schools, but rather to aid for the time being in the development and maintenance of the school system established by local government, and which must eventually be wholly maintained by the States and Territories wherein they exist, it is hereby provided that no part of the money appropriated under this act shall be paid out by any State or Territory which shall not, during the first five years of the operation of this act, annually expend for the maintenance of common schools an amount equal to the sum which shall be allotted to it under the provisions hereof.

Mr. BLAIR. The words erased are in the bill, "at least one-third;" the words in italics, "an amount equal to," are not yet part of the bill. They are moved as an amendment; one-third instead of the whole amount.

Mr. VEST. Putting another condition on this grant, the ninth section provides—

That a part of the money apportioned to each State or Territory, not exceeding one-tenth thereof, may yearly be applied to the education of teachers for the common schools therein, which sum may be expended in maintaining institutes or temporary training schools, or in extending opportunities for normal or other instruction to competent and suitable persons, of any color, who are without necessary means to qualify themselves for teaching, and who shall agree in writing to devote themselves exclusively, for at least one year after leaving such training schools, to teach in the common schools for such compensation as may be paid other teachers therein.

In other words, the system of normal-school education is forced upon the States, or at least the permission is given (which is equally objectionable) to the States to apply a part of this money to normal schools if they see proper. I say that the genius and spirit of our institutions is that the States shall control the modus operandi of education in order to give educated suffrage to the country under the provisions of the Constitution itself. Again:

SEC. 11. That the moneys distributed under the provisions of this act shall be used in the school districts of the several States and Territories in such way as to provide, as near as may be, for the equalization of school privileges to all the children of the school age prescribed by the law of the State or Territory wherein the expenditure shall be made, thereby giving to each child an opportunity for common-school and, so far as may be, of industrial education; and to this end existing public schools, not sectarian in character, may be aided, and new ones may be established, as may be deemed best in the several localities.

SEC. 12. That any State in which the number of persons 10 years of age and upward who can not read and write is not over 5 per cent. of the whole population thereof shall have the right to receive its allotment and to apply the same for the promotion of common-school and industrial education, or the education of teachers therein, in such way as the Legislature of such State shall provide.

There again is the assumption on the part of the General Government of the right to permit the States to do what they please with their educational fund; a manifest violation, as I conceive, of the spirit of the Constitution.

The Secretary of the Interior shall receive from the governor of each State and Territory a report, &c.

In other words, the General Government is the fountain of this bounty; it may receive an account from the States of this fund; it does not go into the control of the States absolutely as the Constitution in its original conception meant; but the States must make a report and account for this fund.

Go on now to the last clause, to which I call the attention of the Senate. Not satisfied with superintending and controlling and prescribing to the States how they shall educate their people, the last clause of the bill goes into the Territories. I think that local self-government under our form of government obtains in the Territories as well as in the States. The Territories of the United States have their common-school system, and under the bounty of the General Government apply the money in their possession, their taxes and the proceeds of public lands, to the education of their children, and under what sort of emergency is it that this bill, not satisfied with raiding the States on this question, then goes into the Territories and provides:

SEC. 15. That the Secretary of the Interior shall be charged with the practical administration of this act in the Territories and the District of Columbia, through the Commissioner of Education, who shall report annually to Congress its practical operation.

In what Territory of the United States is there a negro population which demands this extraordinary remedy on the part of the Congress of the United States? Why is it that the people of a Territory are found all at once incompetent to manage this subject, and the Secretary of the Interior can go into the Territories, take the subject out of their hands, and practically, as the bill tells him, control the whole of it? I can not vote for any such measure unless I concede the proposition at once in toto that local self-government is to be, as was said by a Senator here in another debate, absolutely sponged out from the Constitution and the political practice of the people of the United States.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, very early in this session I was admonished by the Senator from Missouri that he did not want any counsel or advice from me, and I am not going to offer him any. That statesmanship by which you fix the price of a soldier's wages at $13 a month and legislate so as to put a barrel of flour at $30 by way of keeping up the currency will never be advised by me. Just as I feel about that I feel about this whole question of State rights as it is involved in this matter of public education. I can not fix the date, but if you will just eliminate what the Senator said he read from this bill I could call back occasions when we had just the same kind of speeches delivered in my State relating to almost the same question.

Virginia refused to accept her share of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands distributed to the States many years ago for educational purposes upon such mere abstractions of State rights as I have heard fall from the lips of that Senator to-day. She lived to go through a four-years' war, to come out of it and find that another State had been taken out of a portion of her territory, and the public buildings of the new State constructed out of the proceeds which her State-rights statesmen refused to accept for the education of her children. That is a historical fact.

Now, sir, it does seem to me that we have nothing to consider here except whether this Government has the constitutional right to make this appropriation. That is conceded by the Senator from Missouri; it is conceded by every Senator on this floor, and if I were within what might be called the decorum of this body in repeating what the Senator from New Hampshire said the other day, it does look to me as if some folks want to beat this bill by indirection. If it is constitutional, why not make the appropriation? If it is constitutional to make the appropriation, there can be no constitutional inhibition upon the conditions that shall attach to the appropriation.

What I want is this money to educate our people if this Government can constitutionally give it to us. We care not how it shall be disbursed, so that the children of Virginia shall be the beneficiaries thereof, white and black. If Senators are ready to meet that issue, then it seems to me we are ready to vote.

State rights! Do not impose some conditions, do not impose some books! Why, sir, books are imposed now. Books are imposed in the State of Virginia; books are included in the school curriculum in Missouri, I suppose. The book agent comes along and he gets what is called the educational board to adopt his books, and when they adopt it the town trustees or the township trustees must all accept those books. I have actually known in the county where I live, and where there are about 130 or 140 colored voters out of 3,500, that a school book was in use there that it was said advocated social equality, and yet I have not heard of it hurting anybody in that community especially. I have thought the children were better for the education they received, and the more education they would get the further they would be from that kind of notion.

I say, sir, that I want the gentlemen who represent what they call the South in this discussion to say whether they are for or against an appropriation by and from the Federal Government for the purposes of universal education. That is the only question. I want them to answer that question. The question of State rights does not enter into it. If we can get down to a vote on that proposition there would not be a dissentient anywhere on that side of the Chamber in my judgment, and if you can lug into it this question of State rights, this abstraction, this will-o'-the-wisp, this thing that is buried, and that when it existed was hardly within the scope of any man's vision—lug that in here, and you then just simply make a political question of a great practical measure for universal education.

I ask the Senator from Missouri whether he is willing to accept this? If he is not willing to accept it for his State, I ask whether he is willing to allow me and my colleague to accept it for ours, and we will take the resulting consequences. We are not afraid that a school commissioner appointed by the Federal Government will tear away the social fabric there or destroy the law of contracts or anything of that sort. We want our people educated. We tax our people $1,400,000 a year for the purpose of education. We have promised the people to double the school-houses in that State in four years. Four hundred thousand slaves were turned loose there as free men and we are trying to educate them. We are laying the foundations there of normal schools in which to educate teachers who in turn may educate their own race. If the Federal Government will come to our support with any amount of money, no matter what conditions may be coupled with it, I am ready to accept it, because I know that they can not, and it is idle to argue that they can, couple with it any conditions that would compromise the honor of that State or its status in this Union.

My own purpose in speaking on this question at all is to eliminate from it all these little side-door arrangements. I do not suppose that I can change the convictions of any Senator on the main question, but I do want it to go forth and to be distinctly understood who are for and who are against this appropriation, and then let the reasons be given.

The Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES], who is scarcely second to any constitutional lawyer in this country, has said that this bill is constitutional—constitutional in this, that it makes the appropriation. That it is constitutional in that I invite challenge, knowing how thoroughly he is versed in all that appertains to the constitutional aspect of this case, whether there can possibly be anything unconstitutional in saying how the money shall be paid out. Then it comes down to this: that the Senator from Missouri does not want this money given for public education in his State unless it shall go through a certain channel. We want it, and we care not whom you may designate to give it to us. You may do like Peabody, for instance, that great benefactor of education, and designate a Massachusetts trustee to take charge of the graded schools of Virginia, and we will accept it. We will realize the benefit of it as we have realized the benefits of the Peabody fund through our graded schools of Virginia up to this time. It is for the benefit of education; and it is simply a question as to whether we want this money, and whether it is constitutional to have it, and whether the Senate is willing to give it to us. Let those who do not want it say so in terms; but do not try to belittle the subject; do not say that it is in violation of some abstract constitutional principle that was long ago played out, particularly in Virginia, that State which, I repeat, refused to accept her proportion of the proceeds of the public lands and left the children without the benefit of them, and they were subsequently utilized to build the public buildings of a State that was erected out of her territory to send State-rights Senators to this body!

I ask, sir, that we may have a vote on the direct proposition, and that every Senator will vote upon it whether he is for or against this proposition and whether he believes it is constitutional to make the appropriation, no matter through what medium it may come to us.

Mr. BUTLER. I suggest that it is rather late, and I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHERMAN in the chair). The Senator from South Carolina moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and thirteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 24, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

UNLAWFUL FENCING OF PUBLIC LANDS IN NEBRASKA, ETC.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a communication from the Commissioner of the General Land Office in relation to the unlawful fencing of public lands in the State of Nebraska and elsewhere; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. PETERS, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for to-day on account of important business.

THREATENED OVERFLOW AT NEW ORLEANS.

Mr. ELLIS. I ask unanimous consent to present and have immediately considered a joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is it a report from the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. ELLIS. It has the approval of the Committee on Appropriations and of the Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which there will be opportunity to object.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution appropriating $300,000 to prevent the overflow of the city of New Orleans, La., and the country adjacent thereto.

Whereas the waters of the Mississippi River have risen to the high-water mark of 1874 at New Orleans, which is the highest known in the flood annals of the great river, and are rising at all points between Saint Louis and New Orleans from two to three inches per day; and

Whereas the appalling calamity of the overflow of a city of 300,000 souls is imminent, entailing as it inevitably must immense suffering, great loss of life and of public and private property, and vast destruction and damage to the commerce of the United States: Now, therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the sum of $300,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be immediately available, be and is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and placed under the control of the Secretary of War, to be used in his discretion to prevent the overflow of the city of New Orleans and the country adjacent thereto.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to its present consideration?

Mr. DUNN. I should like to have some explanation, reserving the right to object afterward. I want to know by what sort of legerdemain the Committee on Appropriations have leaped from the Ohio River to the city of New Orleans, leaving out and disregarding the appeals which have been made by 200,000 people in Arkansas and Mississippi?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas desires to reserve the right to object until explanation is made. Is there objection?

Mr. ELLIS. Excepting to the word "legerdemain," so glibly used by the gentleman from Arkansas, I say to him and to this House——

Mr. DUNN. I will substitute the word "athletic."

Mr. ELLIS. That is equally objectionable and exceptionable.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have this to state: That relief of sufferers by these floods was especially committed to the discretion and direction of the Secretary of War. I conferred with the gentleman from Arkansas himself upon a resolution introduced for the relief of certain people, and he and I agreed, right where he is sitting now, to the scope and tenor of the resolution reported from the Committee on Appropriations, which became the law in this case.

Mr. DUNN. Let me correct the gentleman. I introduced a resolution which expressed my views. It was to go to the Secretary. I advised that when I talked with the gentleman—that is, to give the Secretary an appropriation in hand to be used in his discretion for the relief of the sufferers by the overflow of the Mississippi River and its tributaries. That was the advice I gave.

Mr. ELLIS. My impression remains the same, that the gentleman and I agreed to the scope and tenor of the resolution I presented and which became the law in this case. But I accept his correction.

Mr. Speaker, this is not for the relief of sufferers, but is to prevent what must be the appalling calamity of this age. The water of the river, by the reports to-day, is up to the top of the levees.

Mr. DUNN rose.

Mr. ELLIS. I beg the gentleman to sit down and listen to my statement, and then I will yield to him.

Mr. DUNN. I wish to make an explanation. I wish to say to the gentleman from Louisiana right here that he does not go before me in sympathy with, or in readiness to give relief to, this people.

Mr. ELLIS. I thank the gentleman. Nor does he go before me in sympathy with the people of his own State and district who are or may be sufferers. It is the history and it is the experience wherever the flood-waters go over a levee that levee is doomed and destroyed. As long as the waters remain at the top of the levee or on the river side of the levee there is no danger. As soon as it goes over it commences to wash a trench or channel in the river and away goes the levee.

To-day the city of New Orleans for a distance of eleven miles is living under a wall of water sixteen feet above the level of its streets; nothing in the world between them and that river sixteen feet above them but a dirt wall—nothing else; and this is the condition for eleven miles above the homes and business of 300,000 people.

Mr. Speaker, that city, as every one knows who is acquainted with its topography, is built on a dead level—as level as the area in front of your desk, sir. There is no back country to which the people can flee. North of them is Lake Pontchartrain and impenetrable swamp for more than thirty-five miles; south is an impenetrable sea marsh; east of them and west of them is the same condition; and there is no hill, no back country, no friendly hand which can assist them or to which they can flee in case those levees break. They are there face to face with their fate.

The calamity, sir, which may ensue can not be depicted by human tongue. It would be the calamity of this age if it should occur. Now, sir, the Legislature is not in session. The city is doing everything it possibly can, and yet fate seems to be upon them.

Therefore, upon the approval of the Secretary of War, upon the best information we have, I presented this matter to the Committee on Appropriations this morning, and they concluded it was wise this appropriation should be placed under the direction of the Secretary of War, or so much thereof as may be necessary to be used. It is to be entirely within his discretion and for the prevention of this calamity.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, human tongue can not depict what the condition would be if these levees should go under. Once the river washes over them they are gone and the river is precipitated upon them, and will be precipitated with an impetus which will overturn houses, wash out homes and streets, and involve the city in absolute ruin.

There is in that city public property of the United States as well as private property of citizens. There is the landing-place for all the great commerce of the West. This is in the nature of prevention, and if this calamity should occur there is no calculating the unutterable damage that must follow.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman permit me to make a statement there?

Mr. ELLIS. With pleasure.

Mr. DUNN. All that the gentleman has so well stated with reference to the appalling magnitude of the inpending calamity I fully indorse. The danger that now threatens can be measured by no man upon this floor. But let me call the gentleman's attention and that of the House to the fact that the full extent of that impending calamity has not been stated. The Mississippi River to-day in my district is ninety miles wide and has been for more than thirty days. There is an unprecedentedly large rise coming down from the Missouri River, supplemented by another great rise out of the Ohio River, which will come down upon the top of the preceding overflow. Instead of continuing for thirty or forty days this flood will continue for seventy or ninety days. Seventy thousand people to-day in my district have their homes flooded and are driven out of them, and can only reach them by dug-outs, boats, or rafts. Two-thirds of that population are laboring negroes, who have no subsistence, no credit or hope of sustenance after their present supply is gone, except the prospect of making a crop, which will be swept away by the continuation of this great flood which is inevitable from the added rise now coming.

Mr. Speaker, I have lived for thirty years within the influence of those waters. I know what is their magnitude and what the duration of the floods will be when they reach the height which they have already attained, and what is to come, from the reports and dispatches of the last few days. Why, then, does not the Committee on Appropriations direct what I asked them two weeks ago to do, to give the Secretary of War means to be used, in his discretion, when the conditions found by his officers of inspection and examination make it a necessity? These people are not apt to come here and ask for help. They never did. I have lived in the thirty years of my acquaintance with them through twenty overflows of that great river, and in the history of all this great nation but one single time have they come to ask aid from Congress, and that was after the great drought of 1881, which placed them at the mercy of their more fortunate countrymen who could grant assistance; for their food supply was absolutely gone. The flood of 1882 found them without subsistence. That condition of things does not exist to-day. But if this superadded flood-water from the Ohio and Missouri Rivers precipitates the condition that I foresee, it will precipitate a condition of disaster and distress that has been absolutely unparalleled in the history of this country.

I am not objecting, and I am the last man on the floor of this House to stand in the way of putting every possible safeguard around the great city of New Orleans. The gentleman has not pictured the impending danger in too high colors. With all his eloquence he is unable to do that. No man can foresee the magnitude of the calamity which is impending in case the levees to which he has referred should break. Congress can not too soon hasten to the relief of that city. The emergency is pressing, the danger is threatening, the results will be appalling. But in your anxiety to relieve the impending danger there do not forget that there are 250,000 or 300,000 people who are in equal danger scattered throughout other sections of that part of the country—not in an aggregated mass, it is true, not in one city, but scattered in a most helpless, hopeless condition throughout the swamps and forests of that great valley. Arm the Secretary with the means for their relief, and leave to his discretion and sound judgment the manner of using it.

Mr. MONEY. I ask that the resolution may be again read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask if the gentleman from Arkansas objects to its consideration.

Mr. DUNN. I do not.

Mr. RICE. I think this should come from the Committee on Appropriations. I object.

Mr. MONEY. Let the resolution be again reported.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

Mr. KEIFER. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon his objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Massachusetts to object to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. KEIFER. I hope that will not be done. This has been recommended by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Massachusetts to base his objection to the present consideration of the resolution on the ground that it should go to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. KEIFER. I want to state to the gentleman that this matter has been already considered by the Committee on Appropriations this morning.

Mr. ELLIS. It has been already considered and recommended by the committee.

Mr. REED. How did it get there?

Mr. ELLIS. And I appeal to him to remember the magnanimity of Boston in 1868, when she gave $300,000 in a similar emergency. I appeal to his humanity, and also on the score of economy; because if there is delay in this matter the House will not be found considering the ounce of prevention but many pounds of cure.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. Let the resolution be read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that unless the objection is withdrawn this debate is out of order.

Mr. RICE. I see no reason why this matter should not go through the Committee on Appropriations. If the committee see that assistance is needed they can report a bill to the House under their privilege of reporting at any time; and I would be the last one to object to such a measure coming through the regular and legitimate channels. And unless I am assured by some member of the Committee on Appropriations that this resolution has been considered by that committee and a majority of them are in favor of its passage, I shall insist upon my objection.

Mr. RANDALL. In answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts, it is proper for me to say that the subject has been informally considered by the Committee on Appropriations; but they felt they had not the right under the rules to originate the matter in the House. They therefore suggested to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] that he should originate it. It can be safely said, however, there is no dissent in the committee as to the propriety of this action.

Mr. ELLIS. The committee were unanimous.

Mr. HUNT. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts, in view of the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will withdraw his objection.

Mr. RICE. I withdraw the objection.

There being no further objection, the joint resolution (H. Res. 212) was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. MONEY. I ask that the resolution be again reported.

The joint resolution was again read.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I understand the resolution limits the appropriation to New Orleans and to preventing the overflow of the river.

Mr. ELLIS. That is correct.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It appears to me that that is narrowing it down more than it ought to be.

Mr. BEACH. I simply desire to say that I am opposed to the passage of this resolution. In view of the recent action of this House upon a similar resolution, I do not think it worth while to take up time in stating the reasons of my opposition. I wish to give notice that upon the passage of this resolution I shall call for the yeas and nays. I think it only proper that upon the passage of all bills and resolutions appropriating money out of the Treasury in so large an amount as this the yeas and nays should be taken.

Mr. YORK. I regret very much to oppose this resolution. But it seems to me if we follow on in this line of precedent that the end will be very disastrous to the tax-payers of the country. I do not see that we are here to grant relief to every man that is an unfortunate in the United States. It really seems to me that the people along the Mississippi River will require all the money the Government owns or possesses. Every day we are asked here for an appropriation, for appropriation after appropriation. I think the precedent is wrong. I think it wrong to take the people's money and appropriate it for certain parties in any section of the country. I must therefore oppose this resolution. I regret very much to see it introduced, and I shall ask for the yeas and nays on its passage.

Mr. ELLIS. I demand the previous question.

Mr. HUNT. I desire to make a brief statement.

Mr. PERKINS. I wish to ask the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] a question.

Mr. ELLIS. I withdraw the demand for the previous question, and yield to my colleague [Mr. HUNT] two minutes.

Mr. REAGAN. It seems to me to be important that the evidence on which this action is asked should be stated to the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. HUNT] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. HUNT. Returning to this city after an enforced leave of absence, I found on my table awaiting me a letter from one of the engineers upon the Mississippi River Commission, predicting the greatest disaster that can be possibly conceived of. I regret very much that I did not put the letter in my pocket and bring it here so that I could read it to the House. He takes occasion in that letter to say that for promptness and wisdom in action the Secretary of War deserves every commendation, and he goes on to dwell upon the great danger to which the country is exposed through the interests involved.

I hope that nobody will object to this resolution, or insist upon its going over until to-morrow morning, lest it cost the country many times over the paltry amount that is sought to be appropriated now.

Mr. ELLIS. I yield half a minute to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES].

Mr. OATES. I do not desire to consume any of the time of the House in making a speech. I am opposed to this appropriation. I am opposed to appropriating money, the common property of the United States, out of the Treasury for the relief of people either from flood, fire, or storm. I do not think we have the constitutional power to do it; and I content myself by requesting permission to print remarks upon this subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks leave to have printed in the RECORD some remarks on this subject. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. ELLIS. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. MONEY. I ask the gentleman from Louisiana to permit me to offer an amendment, which I think will strengthen his proposition.

Mr. PERKINS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Louisiana a question. What is the reason the $1,000,000 appropriated as an emergency appropriation can not be used, or some part of it, for this purpose? I understand the Secretary of War stated to General King and others that could be done.

Mr. ELLIS. My impression is that very little of that appropriation remains.

Mr. PERKINS. I understood the Secretary of War to say it all remained, or nearly so. I mean the sum which we appropriated this session as an emergency appropriation.

Mr. ELLIS. My information is that that sum is expended. And the Secretary of War this morning told me, through the telephone, that he approved this action.

Mr. CHACE. Does the gentleman from Louisiana say the last appropriation of a million dollars is all expended?

Mr. ELLIS. That is my information.

Mr. MONEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Louisiana one question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana has demanded the previous question. Pending that no debate is in order. Does the gentleman withdraw the demand for the previous question?

Mr. ELLIS. I do not.

The SPEAKER. The question then is, Shall the previous question be ordered on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution?

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 64, noes 33.

Mr. YORK. No quorum has voted.

Mr. ELLIS. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that point of order, and let the test be made on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. YORK. Well, I withdraw it.

So (no further count being called for) the previous question was ordered.

The question was upon ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. BELFORD. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BELFORD. It is whether, after the previous question is ordered, we are not entitled under the rules to an hour's debate.

The SPEAKER. If there had been no debate previously, then under the rule there would be thirty minutes allowed for debate; but there was debate on this joint resolution before the previous question was ordered by the House.

Mr. MONEY. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MONEY. Is it in order to move to commit this whole matter to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions?

The SPEAKER. Not now; that motion will be in order at the proper time.

Mr. MONEY. I desire to give notice that at the proper time I will submit that motion.

The SPEAKER. When the previous question has been ordered or called on the passage of the joint resolution a motion to commit will then be in order.

The joint resolution was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. YORK. And on that question I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Is an amendment now in order?

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution has passed the stage of amendment.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Then I move to recommit the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution was not reported from a committee.

Mr. MONEY. I move to commit the joint resolution to the Committee on Appropriations, with instructions to report an appropriation of $500,000, to be expended at the discretion of the Secretary of War for the benefit of the whole river between Memphis and New Orleans.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman had better reduce his proposition to writing.

Mr. ELLIS. I demand the previous question on the passage of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. On the motion to commit with instructions and upon the passage?

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, sir; on the motion to commit and on the passage of the joint resolution.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 52, noes 37.

So (no further count being called for) the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the motion submitted by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY].

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be instructed to report a joint resolution appropriating the sum of $500,000, to be expended by the Secretary of War, in his discretion, in preventing the overflow of the city of New Orleans, and for relieving persons rendered destitute by the overflow of the Mississippi River.

Mr. RICE. I object to the form of the resolution. It is not a motion to commit; it is simply instructions to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MONEY. My motion was to commit with instructions, and what has been read is simply the form of the instructions.

Mr. BELFORD. Will this operate as a motion to commit?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] makes a motion to commit to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions, and has reduced his instructions to writing, which have been read.

Mr. YORK. I want to understand one thing before the question is taken on this motion.

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable; the House has ordered the previous question.

Mr. YORK. Then I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. YORK. Do these instructions require the Committee on Appropriations to report an appropriation of $500,000?

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary question; the instructions speak for themselves.

Mr. YORK. Is that the understanding?

Mr. MONEY. It is.

The question was taken on the motion to commit with instructions, and it was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. BEACH. And on that I call for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken on ordering the yeas and nays, and there were 47 in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 98, nays 115, not voting 108; as follows:

YEAS—98.

So the joint resolution was not passed.

During the roll-call,

Mr. KING said: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I do not think the question as announced by the Speaker was understood by the House. Some members understand that this vote is on recommitting the bill. I have been so informed by a colleague of mine.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see any question of privilege in the gentleman's statement.

Mr. KING. My point is that many members of the House do not understand the question which is being voted upon.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not control that matter. He has stated the question several times; but unfortunately there has been so much confusion on the floor this morning that it is almost impossible to transact business. This question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

The roll-call having been concluded,

Mr. CALKINS said: I desire to inquire whether my colleague [Mr. MATSON] has voted upon this question?

The SPEAKER. He has not.

Mr. CALKINS. I am paired with him. I desire to state that if I were not paired I would vote "ay."

The following pairs were announced from the Clerk's desk:

Mr. EATON with Mr. BARR, until the 25th inst.

Mr. SKINNER, of North Carolina, with Mr. SKINNER, of New York, until the 30th inst.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, with Mr. DAVIDSON, until the 25th inst.

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire, with Mr. BUCHANAN, until the 29th inst.

The following named members were announced as paired until further notice:

Mr. YOUNG with Mr. BAYNE.

Mr. SNYDER with Mr. GOFF.

Mr. MORGAN with Mr. MORRILL.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana, with Mr. STOCKSLAGER.

Mr. FINERTY with Mr. HARMER.

Mr. GIBSON with Mr. BINGHAM.

Mr. HATCH, of Michigan, with Mr. PAIGE.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, with Mr. MCCOMAS.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE with Mr. HOOPER.

Mr. COBB with Mr. PARKER.

Mr. LE FEVRE with Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois.

Mr. MCADOO with Mr. THOMAS.

Mr. STORM with Mr. CHACE.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, with Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina.

Mr. CONNOLLY with Mr. GEORGE, on all political questions.

The following were announced for this day:

Mr. MCKINLEY with Mr. HURD.

Mr. RYAN with Mr. CLARDY.

Mr. HAMMOND with Mr. LIBBEY, on all political questions.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have my vote recorded in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman vote?

Mr. BARKSDALE. I was not in the Hall when the vote was taken.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the Chair can not entertain the gentleman's request.

Mr. SINGLETON. I desire unanimous consent to record my vote. I was in the cloak-room when my name was called.

The SPEAKER. The rule does not permit the Chair to entertain the request.

Mr. SINGLETON. If permitted to vote, I would vote "ay."

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker, as I understood, I was paired with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND]. I did not hear that pair announced; but I did hear read a pair between the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LIBBEY]. Understanding that I was paired, I refrained from voting. Under these circumstances I think my vote ought to be recorded.

The SPEAKER. There are at the desk two pairs embracing the name of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. PAYSON. The pair of the gentleman from Georgia with myself was not announced. That pair having been arranged in good faith, I think I ought to be allowed to vote.

The SPEAKER. There are two pairs of the gentleman from Georgia on the Clerk's table—one with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON].

Mr. PAYSON. It was not announced, however.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] states that he refrained from voting because he supposed he was paired with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND]; but he discovers by the announcement of the pairs that the gentleman from Georgia is paired with another member. Under these circumstances the gentleman from Illinois asks leave to have his vote recorded. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and Mr. PAYSON voted in the affirmative.

Mr. CHACE. Mr. Speaker, I perceive I am announced as paired. I was not aware that I was paired. I had a pair with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS], which expired on the last legislative day.

The SPEAKER. According to a statement in the hands of the Clerk, the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] is paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM]. The Chair of course has no other information on the subject.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. ELLIS. I ask that this joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The resolution having been voted upon and rejected, it is now disposed of. But the gentleman can reintroduce it and have it referred.

Mr. CALKINS. By unanimous consent it may be referred.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] can introduce a joint resolution in the same form for reference.

Mr. ELLIS, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 212) appropriating $300,000 to prevent the overflow of the city of New Orleans, La., and the country adjacent thereto; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

COLORADO SCHOOL LANDS.

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask by unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill 74, to enable the State of Colorado to take lands in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections found to be mineral lands, and to secure to the State of Colorado the benefit of the act of July 2, 1862, entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," and put it upon its passage at this time.

Mr. SHELLEY. I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BARBOUR. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. This being the fourth Monday in the month, the regular order is the consideration of business reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia. The Chair is advised that there is no business from that committee on the House Calendar.

Mr. BARBOUR. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House to consider District of Columbia business on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar for the purpose of considering bills relating to the District of Columbia.

Mr. BARBOUR. I ask that the House first proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4689) for the relief of Eliza W. Patterson.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all national, municipal, and county taxes, general and special, and all interests, costs, and penalties thereon, levied or assessed to and including June 30, 1883, upon the property (in the District of Columbia) now held (or claimed) by Walter S. Cox and others, in trust for Eliza W. Patterson, widow of Carlile P. Patterson, late Superintendent of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey, be, and the same are hereby, remitted and canceled: Provided, That any outstanding certificates of sale for taxes in the name of Carlile P. Patterson, late one of the trustees of said Eliza W. Patterson, shall be surrendered and canceled: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to require the District of Columbia or the United States to repay any sums heretofore paid for the purchase of said property at tax sale: And provided further, That the acceptance of the provisions of this act by said trustee and beneficiaries shall be a full release and satisfaction of all claims of every kind on their part for damages of any kind against the United States, the District of Columbia, or the city of Washington claimed to have been done to said property.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is reported back from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 6, after the word "eighty," insert the word "three;" so that it will read "1883."

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I ask either that the report be read or that we may have some explanation of this matter before we are called upon to give our votes upon it.

The report was read, as follows:

That they have considered said petition, and from the evidence submitted find that the petitioner and her children are the owners of a considerable tract of land lying in the northeastern section of the city, the major portion being situated north of M street and east of North Capitol street, and that prior to 1872 this land was used for agricultural or grazing purposes. In 1871 Congress authorized the formation of what was known as the board of public works, and in 1872 and 1873 that board, in the prosecution of its scheme for the improvement of the city and its suburbs, opened several of the streets and avenues running by or through the property in question, and at about the same time constructed a number of extensive sewers and paved the footways and gutters along the opened streets. In order to avoid heavy grades the streets and avenues, so far as the property in question is concerned, were not run over the natural surface of the ground, but on grades very much above or below that surface, and consequently upon completion of the work nearly the whole of the property of the petitioner was left either ten or twenty feet above or below the grades of the several streets on which it fronted.

Upon inspection of the property your committee find that a large brick sewer has been built above the ground and diagonally across several of the largest and most valuable squares; and that the branch of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, which occupies First street east, and which is constructed on an embankment about fifteen feet high, runs between those squares, separating them into two portions. Each portion is occupied to a considerable extent by pools of stagnant water, which, owing to the construction of the streets on abnormal grades, have a deficient outlet. The remainder of the property has been cut up by the streets into small parcels of land ten to twenty feet above grade. No houses, buildings, or improvements of any kind exist anywhere on any part of this property, and with the exception of a dilapidated house built early in the century, and a few frame dwellings of little value, none exist anywhere in the neighborhood, and testimony has been submitted proving that this was the case in the past as well as in the present.

Considering that this property was either arable land, common, or meadow, and not only uninhabited, but remote from the settled portions of the city, your committee is of the opinion that the opening of streets, construction of sewers, and paving of footways and gutters was unnecessary in its vicinity. Inspection proves conclusively that any benefit derived from the execution of such works has resulted to the United States and general public in obtaining a more easy access to the Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, located at the eastern end of M street, and not at all to the petitioner; on the contrary, she has clearly experienced great injury, her land being rendered useless for agricultural purposes and unsalable for building sites, even had any demand existed, prior to the completion of the so-called improvements, for its appropriation to the latter service; and your committee is therefore of the opinion that the petitioner is, and has been for many years, justly entitled to compensation for the injury done her property.

In fixing the amount of this compensation your committee has considered:

First. The probable cost of bringing the squares and lots to the established grades. The total area of the property that will require treatment some time is 1,069,276 square feet. Of this about 300,000 square feet are from 6 to 20 feet above, and about 750,000 square feet from 6 to 20 feet below grade; or 1,050,000 square feet will require grading. Taking the minimum figures, 6 feet, for the amount of the cutting and filling, the grading necessary reaches 6,300,000 cubic feet and 230,000 cubic yards.

The price of grading in this vicinity is 22 cents per cubic yard, with all hauling beyond 200 feet at half a cent per cubic yard for every 100 feet. To grade the property in question will cost, therefore, $50,600 plus $1,150 for every 100 feet of hauling over the 200 feet allowed. As there is no available material nearer than 1,000 feet, the cost of grading the property would probably exceed $60,000.

Second. The testimony of several real-estate dealers, persons of experience, who have inspected the property and have assessed the damages done it by the so-called improvements. This testimony, which is under oath, places the amount at about $47,000.

Third. The evident depreciation of the property since the date of the improvements, which, as shown by the official assessments, certainly equals $60,000. The claim of the petitioner that the difference between the assessments of 1873 and 1883, amounting to $121,544, represents this depreciation, your committee do not consider to have been substantiated. In their opinion the property never approximated in value to the assessment of 1873, and accordingly, in deciding upon the amount of depreciation, that assessment has been ignored. Considering the foregoing, and after personal examination of the land, your committee feel justified in assigning —— as damages.

Furthermore, your committee find that in 1872, and thenceforward, the property of the petitioner was assessed at an extraordinarily high rate and much in excess of the real value of the land. The evidence produced shows that that particular section of the city is, and always has been, practically, uninhabited; that little or no improvement has taken place since the original cession of the land to the United States, and that it never had any value except for farming or gardening purposes; yet the property of the petitioner, after having been rendered useless for such purposes, has been assessed at from $160,000 to $223,000. For so excessive an assessment your committee can find no justification, and believe that the petitioner is rightly entitled to a revision of the assessments of 1873, 1875, 1876, and 1879. In accordance with that belief they have made such a revision, and are of the opinion that a mean between the present assessment and that immediately prior to the assessment of 1872 is as near an approximation to a just valuation as can be obtained.

The assessment immediately prior to that of 1872 was the one made in 1869; and a mean between that and the present assessment would give $132,389 as the value for the last ten years of the property of the petitioner. The annual taxes on such an assessment would have been $1,635 per annum, and, in the opinion of your committee, that amount is all that should be charged against the petitioner as general taxes from 1873 to 1883. Owing to the falling off of the revenue from the land, due to the destruction of its agricultural character, and to the absorption of the husband of the petitioner in public duties and scientific pursuits, the taxes on the property have for eight years been unpaid. The petitioner was entirely ignorant of this fact until after the death of her husband, and since his death has, with the assistance of friends, paid the current taxes. Interest, therefore, should only be charged for the eight years from 1874 to 1882, when the tax was in arrears. This charge amounts, at 10 per cent., to $4,564, and, added to the $16,350, and making in all $20,914, represents the total just indebtedness of the petitioner. Your committee find, however, that between 1872 and 1882 there has been paid by or is charged against the petitioner $27,423 of general taxes, and $17,459 of interest and penalties thereon, making an aggregate charge of $44,882. These taxes, and necessarily the interest thereon, are excessive, and the petitioner is justly entitled to relief to the amount they exceed what should have been charged, or to the difference, equaling $23,968, between her proper indebtedness of $20,914 and the $44,882 for which her estate is liable.

The petitioner is also charged with "special taxes" and interest thereon, amounting in all to $13,038. As these special taxes are a special charge for the purpose of defraying the cost of the very operations that destroyed the value of her property, it is manifestly unjust to call upon the petitioner to pay them, and there is no doubt that she is also properly entitled to relief to that extent.

Reviewing the foregoing, your committee considers the following as a correct estimate of the amount of indemnity which should be afforded:

| Special taxes, and interest and penalties thereon | $13,038 |
| Excess of general taxes, interest, and penalties over and above a just charge | 23,968 |

Your committee find that the estate of the petitioner is now liable for taxes in arrears amounting to $52,873, of which $22,496 is for general taxes, $7,417 for special taxes, and $22,960 is interest and penalties, and that this interest is increasing at the rate of $3,350 per annum. Satisfactory evidence has been submitted proving that the property has been in the market for fully two years, has been offered for sale, both publicly and privately, and that an attempt was made in April, 1883, to dispose of a large quantity of ground at public auction, but that no success has attended any of the foregoing efforts, and in the opinion of competent experts the property is not salable, and this principally on account of the condition in which it has been left by the operations of the board of public works.

A comparison of the value of the lots as assessed for taxes, and the accumulation of taxes, penalties, and interest shows that the latter very closely approximates to the former and in many cases exceed it, and in several instances this excess of the taxes over the value of the lot equals several hundred dollars. Evidently the accumulation of interest on the tax in arrears will soon absorb whatever small balance may now exist in favor of the owner.

The petitioner, Mrs. Patterson, is the widow of the late Superintendent of the Coast Survey, whose services to science and the public were of so eminent a nature. The debt which has accumulated against her estate was incurred entirely without her knowledge and through no fault of her own, and as she is now in embarrassed circumstances and without means of support, your committee, believing that she is justly entitled to damages far exceeding any indebtedness to the United States or to the District, have drawn up the accompanying bill and recommend its passage.

Your committee, at the same time, request to be discharged from the claim for $4,112.27, for destruction of barns, agricultural implements, and produce, contained in the petition, and suggest their reference to the Committee on War Claims.

Your committee ask that the report of the select committee of the Forty-seventh Congress upon this subject be published, and adopted as a part of this report.

[House Report No. 1432, Forty-seventh Congress, first session.]

Mr. KASSON, from the Select Committee in relation to the late Carlile P. Patterson, submitted the following report, to accompany bill H. R. 6428:

The Select Committee in relation to the late Carlile P. Patterson, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6428) for the relief of Eliza W. Patterson, submitted the following report thereon:

The beneficiary, Eliza W. Patterson, is the widow of the late Carlile P. Patterson, Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey of the United States, who died suddenly, in August last, while in the performance of his duties as such officer. Captain Patterson had been connected with this branch of the public service for more than twenty years, during which period his service was distinguished by its great usefulness and the absolute fidelity with which he discharged all his functions.

The character of the service rendered by him deserves more than a passing mention. During and since the civil war he rendered important extraofficial services to the Government for which no compensation was provided by law. During his connection with the Coast Survey, in addition to his constant labors in that department, he was made chairman of the commission to reorganize the revenue-marine service; a member of the commission to examine and test life-saving apparatus and appliances; of the board to prepare a plan for the improvement of the harbor of Washington; of the Interoceanic Canal Commission; and of the Light-House Board; and was called upon for various minor services too numerous to recite. Captain Patterson, equally with Professor Henry, is entitled to recognition for the great improvement in the public service above referred to, and for the very great economy in public expenditure which resulted from his long attention and great labor bestowed upon the question, not only increasing the efficiency of the service, but resulting in a reduction of expenses exceeding a million and a half dollars. For all extraofficial services above referred to no compensation was ever made to him by the Government. The pressure of all these duties and the constancy of his labor led to the absolute neglect of all private interests.

During this period the then government of this District embarked upon that great scheme for the improvement of the city of Washington which was extended beyond the wants of the city, and reached the farm land occupied by the family of Captain Patterson and belonging to his widow. Enormous injury was done to the property, for which, instead of being compensated, heavy taxes were assessed. Disputing their validity, and without means to pay the charges, interest and penalties were added thereto, and the taxes, interest, and penalties remain unpaid to this day. A bill was prepared on behalf of Captain Patterson for relief in chancery for the wrongs done and assessments made.

At the request of the District commissioners the proceeding was stopped, on their assurance that justice should be done. No action, however, was taken, and the condition remained unchanged at the time of the death of Captain Patterson. If these charges are legal, they would nearly absorb the value of the estate.

Captain Patterson left his family almost totally unprovided for and in great distress for the means of support, leaving also debts for even the necessaries of life. His death disclosed the fact that his entire assets left for the benefit of his family amounted to about $500, while the debts last above referred to far exceed that sum.

Under these circumstances your committee deem it their unquestioned duty to recommend the recognition to which the uncompensated services of the deceased are entitled in the form proposed by this bill, which will furnish some means of support to his family, and without which they will be reduced to poverty. They therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill as the most fitting method of doing that justice which the Government owes to a deceased officer unsurpassed in his fidelity and distinguished by the extraordinary and unpaid services which, during twenty years, he has rendered to his country.

Reporting back the memorial referred to them and making it a part of their report, the committee unanimously recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Memorial asking suitable recognition by Congress of the special services rendered the Government by the late Carlile P. Patterson.

To the honorable Senate and
House of Representatives of the United States of America:

The undersigned, recalling the great attainments, high character, and exceptional devotion to duty of the late C. P. Patterson, and believing that the services he rendered to the country demand something more than their mere silent acceptance by the Government, have deemed it just and proper to call the attention of Congress to the case, with a view to such action in the premises as may be deemed advisable.

Mr. Patterson served for twenty years in the survey of the coast, first as hydrographic inspector, from May 4, 1861, to February 17, 1874, and from the latter date to the day of his death, August 15, 1881, as its superintendent.

How well and with what success he performed the duties pertaining to each position is known to and appreciated by Congress and the Government. His services during the eventful period from 1861 to 1865 call forth an emphatic acknowledgment from Professor A. D. Bache, Superintendent, who, in 1862, reports: "At certain junctures during the year the requisites for service in connection with the blockading squadrons have called for more than usual address and promptitude in action. As the instances occurred the difficulties have been met and overcome with the sound judgment that has always directed the ordinary details of the hydrographic division."

And again, in 1865: "The peculiar difficulties which were to be expected during the war were fortunately met by the abilities of Mr. Patterson. His acquaintance with naval routine and intimate knowledge of the local peculiarities of the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts of the United States have been specially advantageous to the work. To his readiness of mind in consultation and sound judgment of details the office is indebted for much of the success which has attended its labors for the last few years."

The Secretary of the Treasury, Hon. William Windom, refers to the late superintendent as follows:

"Combining wide experience with great judgment, he was eminently successful in the conduct of the great national work under his charge; and in his hands its scope was greatly enlarged and its character as a general geodetic survey became fully recognized.

"His efforts have been so earnest in the performance of the various duties which have devolved upon him that to his untiring prosecution of them the immediate loss of his life is to be attributed. With unbounded zeal and ceaseless energy he pressed on without taking the relaxation which nature demanded."

We do not take this occasion for eulogizing the character, the professional ability, or the services of C. P. Patterson. It is due to him, however, to add here that since 1874, when he became superintendent, his private affairs, as well as his health, were utterly neglected, as being hardly worthy of consideration in comparison with the importance of his public duties.

For his eminent services above referred to no special claim for consideration is made, but to those of an extraofficial and unpaid character we beg leave to call attention.

REVENUE-MARINE SERVICE.

In 1869, December 16, the Secretary of the Treasury appointed a special commission to consider and report upon the character of vessels best adapted for the revenue-marine service, together with such views and conclusions upon other matters as might appear to them calculated to advance the interests of the service.

The commission consisted of two officers of the revenue marine and of C. P. Patterson, selected as its president. The report of the commission was made May 1, 1870, and its recommendations were in the main approved by the Secretary and ordered to be carried into effect. The condition of the service and of its personnel at the above date may be inferred from the radical changes made and their prompt acceptance, and from the great reduction of expenses and the increased efficiency which followed.

The long experience of Mr. Patterson in the construction of vessels specially fitted for particular purposes and localities, his knowledge of all the coasts of the United States, and of the cruising grounds adjacent to the principal ports, as well as of the duties and qualifications required of the officers of the service, especially entitled him to take a leading part in this important reform, and experience has proved that it was thorough and successful.

The vessels were divided into first, second, and third class steamers and sailing vessels, varying in size from seventy-five to three hundred and fifty tons, to be built for and assigned to the different localities in view of the requirements in each case; the number of vessels was reduced from thirty-five to thirty-two, and of officers and men from 1,266 to 1,061, making an annual saving in the latter case alone of over $203,000.

The following comparison was made between the amounts needed by the old system and the one recommended:

| Old system for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1872 | $1,446,490 |
| New system for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1872 | 943,638 |
| Leaving a balance in favor of reform of | 502,851 |

The actual expenditures for the year ending June 30, 1872, amounted to $930,249.81.

In the annual report of S. I. Kimball, chief of the bureau for the above year, he states "that the increased efficiency and decreased cost above shown are principally due to carrying into effect, as far as practicable, the recommendations of the special commission above referred to, and to the strict enforcement of the revised regulations promulgated August 1, 1871."

And now, in 1881, as the result of the experience, science, and labor brought to bear by Mr. Patterson on this much-needed reform of the revenue-marine service, Mr. Kimball states that while the expenditures still fall within the original estimate of the commission, the efficiency of the service has been increased fivefold.

It would be safe to estimate from the official published reports in connection with this subject, from 1870 to 1880, that a total saving has been effected of more than a million and a half of dollars. (Senate Ex. Doc., No. 93, Forty-first Congress, second session. Also letter, dated December 28, 1881, from E. W. Clark, esq., chief of division.)

UNITED STATES LIFE-SAVING SERVICE.

In 1871 the Secretary of the Treasury appointed a commission to determine the nature of the life-saving appliances to be furnished to the stations. Mr. Patterson was selected as one of its members. The commission met at Seabright, coast of New Jersey, and there examined and practically tested the various devices then known, among which were many of a novel character, for bringing ashore persons from stranded vessels.

S. I. Kimball, esq., General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service, in a letter addressed to the committee, December 28, 1881, refers as follows to the services of Mr. C. P. Patterson:

"There was no member of the commission to whose opinions greater deference was accorded or whose voice was more potential in determining the selections than Mr. Patterson's, and his services on this occasion were of signal value. This was the only connection he ever had with the Life-Saving Service in an official capacity, but his interest in the operations of the service was active and unceasing. His counsel was frequently and freely sought by the officers of the service up to the time of his death, and there was no person upon whose friendship and wisdom they more absolutely relied."

IMPROVEMENT OF THE HARBOR OF WASHINGTON.

The act of Congress approved by the President March 5, 1872, "to provide for the survey of the harbor and river at Washington, and to report to Congress a full and comprehensive plan for opening, improving, and developing the water channel, and also the feasibility of reclaiming, in any improvement suggested, the swamp and marsh lands along said water front," appointed by name Carlile P. Patterson as a member of the board. The board, of which the Chief of Engineers, Brig. Gen. A. A. Humphreys, was president, consisted of five members.

There were four meetings of the board, at the last of which, December 12, 1872, the minutes of the proceedings state that "Captain Patterson presented an elaborate report and plan for the improvement of the river and harbor, which was considered at length, and, on motion, the report and plans were approved."

The study of the subject was thorough and exhaustive. It included every detail affecting the commerce of the District, the reclamation of the marsh lands, the bridges, wharves, sewerage, &c., and entailed upon its author unusual labor and discrimination both in the field and office. The examination of the report can alone show the extent and value of the services performed by Mr. Patterson in connection with this important subject. (Senate Mis. Doc. No. 15, Forty-second Congress, third session.)

INTEROCEANIC CANAL.

On the 15th of March, 1872, the President appointed a commission to report in regard to the different interoceanic canal surveys and the practicability of the construction of a ship-canal across this continent.

The commission consisted of Brig. Gen. A. A. Humphreys, Chief of Engineers, Mr. Carlile P. Patterson, and Commodore Daniel Ammen, United States Navy.

At the above date some of the surveys were still in progress, and from this cause it was not until about two years afterward that a formal meeting of the commission was held. A careful study of the ten different routes proposed for the canal was indispensable before any conclusion could be reached, and the final report was not made until February, 1876. The labor of examining into the reliability of the different surveys, into the accuracy of the estimates and of the cost and relative practicability of each route, a due portion of which was performed by Mr. Patterson, can only be fully understood and appreciated by the engineer and hydrographer. In reference to the unanimous conclusion of the commission, Rear-Admiral D. Ammen remarks in a letter dated December 24, 1881: "Its importance will not lessen until the recommendations of the commission are carried out."

LIGHT-HOUSE BOARD.

Mr. Patterson was a member of the Light-House Board for nearly seven years, from February, 1874, to August, 1881.

Commander George Dewey, United States Navy, naval secretary to the board, states in regard to the services of Mr. Patterson, "That during the whole of the above period he was chairman of the committee on lighting, and in that capacity he made seventy-one reports, containing an aggregate of six hundred and sixty-five folios, on important matters, which required grave consideration. He was also, from time to time, chairman of a special committee, as business made it necessary, and was for several years a member of the committee on floating aids." During the seven years there were one hundred and ninety-thee meetings, most of which Mr. Patterson attended; and he was always ready to give the board advice on any required subject in the intervals between formal meetings.

Mr. Patterson was a member of the board, selected and appointed by the Secretary of the Navy, in 1865, to ascertain and report upon the best locality for laying up the ironclads and iron vessels of the Navy.

He was also a member of other boards at different periods, to which he was called either as an expert in hydrographic science, or from his high personal character, or from the known enthusiasm with which he would perform any service tending to the advancement of the interests or credit of the country.

The family of Mr. Patterson is left without provision and greatly embarrassed.

The undersigned, therefore, respectfully pray Congress to take into consideration the facts above stated, and to grant such relief as justice and the circumstances appear to require.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not ask for the reading of the other papers in the report.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Let us have a vote.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, as the House expects some explanation of this matter, I will yield so much of my time as may be necessary to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ELDREDGE] who submitted the report in this case, in order that he may answer any questions which gentlemen may have to propound and also to make what further explanation he may deem proper.

Mr. ELDREDGE. As soon as this matter is presented to the House, Mr. Chairman, instinctively the members on both sides put themselves upon the defensive, and for myself I acknowledge that when the petition was referred to the subcommittee on claims of the District of Columbia, in common with my associates, in beginning the examination into the merits of the claim, I entertained about the same feelings as are entertained by gentlemen on this floor.

The bill now pending is predicated upon the petition filed by the claimant in this case, Mrs. Patterson. From the high social standing of that lady, and from the honorable and meritorious services rendered to the country by her husband, as well as a disposition to do exact justice, the subcommittee on the District of Columbia took extraordinary pains to make a full and complete investigation of all the matters belonging to it. And the more they have investigated the subject the more fully they have become satisfied, Mr. Chairman, that the claim is an entirely meritorious and just one, and that it is the duty of this House to pass the pending bill with the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. WAIT. The position of the gentleman from Michigan in the Hall is such that we can not hear his remarks, and I hope he will come more into the center of the Hall.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I am only going to detain the committee for a short while in a brief explanation of the matter. I was about to remark, Mr. Chairman, that this bill is based upon the petition presented to the Committee on the District of Columbia, which was referred to the subcommittee of which I was a member. We took extraordinary pains, I will repeat, in the examination of this claim. It is composed of three claims, in fact. The first one set up in the petition is for the destruction of water-rights of the owner of this property, who is the father of the present claimant.

Many years ago Mr. Pierson was the owner of the property in reference to which this lady claims she has suffered great damage in consequence of the cutting through of certain streets. Mr. Pierson owned a grist-mill on a little stream near here called Tiber Creek.

Many years ago Congress passed an act appropriating about $40,000 for the purpose of ascertaining where they could obtain pure water for the use of the public buildings. In pursuance of that act a search was instituted, and a spring was found near the head of this Tiber Creek, which the Government appropriated for the use of these buildings. That water is now being used here. The other claimants who were affected by the destruction of that little stream which passed through their homes were settled with by the Government but the owner of this particular property never was settled with. Some arrangement was entered into between him and the Government by which his damages were to be left to arbitration, but they were never settled or audited. Neither he nor his heirs have received a farthing of damage for taking the water of Tiber Creek to be used for the purposes of the Government in its public buildings in this city. As I have said, he had on this little stream a grist-mill which was a source of a great deal of revenue to him. Of course its usefulness was destroyed when the water was taken away.

Mr. DUNHAM. I rise to a point of order. It is utterly impossible to hear anything the gentleman will say, and we will be compelled after a while to cast our votes on this bill without knowing anything about it. I will ask the gentleman from Michigan to take a position in the rear of the Hall in order that we may hear him.

Mr. ELDREDGE. My voice is rather bad this morning, as I was sick nearly all night, but as the bill is now before the committee I must do the best I can.

This individual suffered much damage in consequence of the destruction of the value of his property by the destruction of his water rights.

There was another claim presented in this petition, and it is of this character. In the year 1861 a regiment of raw and undisciplined troops was encamped upon the property of this lady, Mrs. Patterson. They burned her barns and various out-buildings, destroyed agricultural implements, and were guilty of other damages. A commission appointed by the commander of a brigade then in town and who had charge of the matter examined into the destruction of the property, reported it was the result of the acts of this undisciplined regiment, and the damages were assessed at $4,112.27. Of that amount she has never received a single farthing.

But the main question of damages arises out of the destruction of property in consequence of the running of streets by the board of public works through this property.

Many years ago, when the board of public works were improving this city, they found it necessary to run three streets through her property. In the grade which they fixed for those streets they left her property piled up ten to twenty feet high on each side of the streets, or else depressed from ten to twenty feet below the level of the grade which they had adopted. The result is, as shown by the evidence taken by the committee, that it will cost the owner of this property at least $60,000 to put it in such condition that anybody on earth would be willing to buy it.

The taxes on this property accumulated for eight years afterward, the lady having no idea but that they were being regularly paid. It was only after the death of her husband that she ascertained the fact of their non-payment. Since that period she has herself paid the taxes. Now the taxes that are unpaid and the fines and the interest upon the taxes unpaid amount to about $50,000; but the real tax, without interest or fines, amounts to between $21,000 and $22,000. She claims that she ought to be relieved from this tax, and the committee believe, with one single exception, they being, with that exception, unanimous in their opinion, that the lady ought to be relieved of the tax upon the property. Entertaining that belief the committee brought in this bill relieving her from the tax, with the understanding that she is to release all other claims that she may have against the Government, that is to say, all of the other claims that are embodied in this petition.

Mr. TUCKER. That appears on the face of the bill.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. Let me ask how much of the taxes do you recommend in the report to be released?

Mr. ELDREDGE. The tax, as I have said, with interest and penalties, amounts in all to about $50,000. The tax proper amounts to about $21,000 or $22,000. The remainder is made up of interest, penalties, &c.

Mr. Chairman, if there ever was a bill of a private character introduced into this House for the relief of any person that should commend itself to the consideration of this House I believe this bill to come within that rule, and to come within it upon its unquestionable merits. It is a bill that ought to be passed, and I hope will pass. It is right that it should pass. I have examined this property and the subcommittee have examined it with me. We have given it careful and thorough examination; and I say here solemnly that, for myself, if this property was given to me as a present—that is, all of the lots which border upon the streets running through the property—on condition that I should pay the taxes, I would not accept the gift, for I do not believe the property at this moment can be sold, or, if sold at all, for enough to pay the tax.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. ELDREDGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. DUNN. I see from the latter part of this bill that you require the claimant here to surrender and cancel and waive certain claims against the District in consideration of the relief granted here.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. DUNN. I understand you to state distinctly that one of the items of damages and one of the claims surrendered by this release is the $4,000 for the destruction of certain property, which claim has been already assessed and ascertained by the commission appointed to examine it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. DUNN. Now, I ask the gentleman why she should be required to surrender that?

Mr. ELDREDGE. The proposition came from the claimant herself. I do not know of any other reason.

Mr. DUNN. I understand the question of the relinquishment of the tax by the Government stands upon its own merits, resulting from the wrongful if not the criminal exercise of the power of certain officials at the time these improvements were being made.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Well, I can not say criminal exercise of power. The property was certainly injured by them, but not criminally.

Mr. DUNN. Very well, then; we will call it the wrongful exercise of power. But the property was injured in the process of carrying out certain improvements in this District. Why, then, should she surrender this property and her other claims against the Government in consideration of receiving what she is entitled to receive under this bill?

Mr. ELDREDGE. She is perfectly willing to waive them all in consideration of the passage of this bill, the release of the tax.

Mr. DUNN. That may be all very true, because sometimes a person who is condemned to be hanged is willing to enter upon a lease of life for only one hour when he may be rightfully entitled to his full share of it according to the course of nature.

Mr. TUCKER. Let me interrupt the gentleman to say that is just about the condition of this lady. She has been compelled to waive her rights in order to get a part of what she is entitled to.

Mr. DUNN. And the question that I desire to ask in this connection is whether it is right or not to place her in that position and require this relinquishment?

Mr. ELDREDGE. Perhaps not. I do not pretend to say that it is; but the committee, as the gentleman will see, would hardly be justifiable in giving the claimant more than she asks.

Mr. DUNN. She ought to have what she is entitled to.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Of course. But this is her own proposition, as I understand it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MULDROW. I rise to a question of order. It is utterly impossible to hear what is going on. We can not hear the gentleman in charge of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is endeavoring to preserve order.

Mr. CANNON. Before the gentleman yields the floor I want to ask for a copy of the report in this case. It seems impossible to get it. I have sent to the document-room without success.

Mr. ELDREDGE. They can not be obtained. I yield now five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR].

Mr. HORR. Mr. Chairman, this is not the first time that this bill has been before the American Congress. It was before the Forty-seventh Congress, and came, as I now remember, within three or four votes of being passed by a two-thirds majority.

I agree with the report of this committee, and I do so after having examined, with considerable care, all the facts connected with the case. I wish to say here that as a rule I should oppose all bills of this kind.

When this city was improved under the administration of Mr. Shepherd there were some hardships which transpired that nothing but an act of Congress can remedy. In saying this I must also say that I consider that his improvements and plans did more for the city of Washington than perhaps anything that ever happened to it since its organization as a city.

But in this case here was a property valued at over $200,000 at that time. They cut sewers through it, cut streets through it, and finally assessed a tax against it of over $21,000. The fact is that instead of the last assessment upon that property showing that it has increased in value by these improvements, they have cut down the assessment to less than one-half of what it was at that time, showing that instead of increasing its value they actually injured the value of the property to a very large extent. Something like $53,000 of taxes have accumulated upon it, due previous to the two years past. This lady has struggled and paid the tax for the past two years. And what she asks of Congress is to relieve her of those previous taxes which were in effect nothing less than a confiscation of her estate. It has been utterly impossible for years for her to have sold the entire property so as to have paid what they claim the improvement has added to its value. This is a matter of fact. There is no doubt about it. And to-day it is doubtful whether if she should sell the entire property under the hammer it would bring enough to pay the taxes that have been levied against it as taxes for improvements which were supposed to benefit the property, and were levied upon the ground that they had benefited it that much. Now, that is all there is of this case.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HORR. Certainly. I will not agree to answer it, but I will if I know how.

Mr. CANNON. Was there any machinery by which damages could be assessed when these improvements were made?

Mr. HORR. I am not familiar with the manner in which the city authorities arranged the assessment of these taxes. I do know if you will go over the property the very sight of it will show you those streets damaged it immensely instead of benefiting it.

Mr. CANNON. I ask the gentleman further whether the owner of the property has had a day in court; whether she has had a chance to be heard touching the question of damages?

Mr. HORR. I do not know that anybody here had that opportunity. I think not.

Mr. CANNON. Why, certainly. I think there can be no doubt of the proposition that when these improvements were made there was an assessment both of the benefits derived by private property and the damages sustained by it through those improvements.

Mr. HORR. I presume that took place. But my reply to the gentleman is that when that was done they found this property should pay for the benefits to this large amount. Now, suppose, as was the case, the improvements did actually damage the property instead of benefiting it, why, then, does not the gentleman see that it ruins the property to make it pay these taxes?

Mr. CANNON. Can the gentleman answer me another question?

Mr. HORR. I do not know.

Mr. CANNON. Can the gentleman tell me whether after these improvements were made the property was less valuable in the market than before they were made?

Mr. HORR. Yes, sir; there is no doubt about it.

Mr DUNHAM. I will ask the gentleman to state further whether it is not a fact that this lady advertised the property a year ago and could not get a bid for it?

Mr. HORR. She has several times tried to sell it, but could get no bidders to an amount that would leave her with anything. She could not sell it for enough to pay the taxes.

Mr. CANNON. Did the committee make the necessary investigation to ascertain if this was the only case, or are there tens and hundreds of other similar cases?

Mr. HORR. I asked that question of members of the committee and they told me that with the exception of the Carroll property, to which we gave this relief a week or two ago, this is the only remaining case.

Mr. CANNON. Let me ask one further question. Is it not true that every dollar of these delinquent taxes as well as all other delinquent taxes is pledged to the redemption of what are called the improvement bonds, and if you vote this $50,000, in other words relinquish this tax, does it not mean that we pledge ourselves to appropriate from the Treasury $50,000 to replace it?

Mr. HORR. As I understand it that is precisely the fact. If we release this tax of $52,000, one-half of that amount will have to come out of the whole property of the city, and the other half of it will have to come out of the pockets of the people of this nation to make those bonds good. I have no doubt about that.

Mr. CANNON. I ask the gentleman further whether his committee considered——

Mr. HORR. It is not my committee. I am not a member of it.

Mr. CANNON. I ask him whether he is aware that the committee considered the propriety of allowing the owners of these properties to go to the Court of Claims and have the question of benefit or damage adjudicated.

Mr. HORR. I do not know whether the committee have considered that or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HORR. I am informed by the members of the committee that the proof before the committee is clear that it would sacrifice this entire property to require it to pay these taxes. Now, I say that species of confiscation ought not to be permitted by the American Congress against any widow in the United States, however it might be in the case of a full-grown man.

Mr. CANNON. I did not hear the gentleman's remarks. Will he be kind enough to repeat it?

Mr. HORR. I say it is a kind of confiscation that in my judgment this Government ought not to allow toward any widow woman in the land, even if it would do it toward a full-grown man.

The CHAIRMAN here rapped to order.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman from Michigan allow me to make one further suggestion there?

Mr. HORR. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. Is it not true these taxes were levied ten to twelve years ago?

The CHAIRMAN (rapping). The gentleman from Illinois is out of order. The Chair has requested gentlemen to be in order.

Mr. HORR. I am holding the floor by the courtesy of my colleague from Michigan [Mr. ELDREDGE], whom I do not now see.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has informed the gentleman from Michigan that the five minutes yielded to him has expired.

Mr. BARBOUR. Does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] want more time?

Mr. HORR. Just a few moments.

Mr. BARBOUR. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HORR (to Mr. CANNON). Now, then, what is your question?

Mr. CANNON. Partly in the form of a question, partly by way of reply to the last remark which the gentleman made. If he will allow me a half a minute, possibly two minutes, I will be obliged to him.

Mr. HORR. Go ahead.

Mr. CANNON. I understand the facts in this case to be these: Some ten or twelve years ago, when these improvements were made, taxes were levied on this property in common with all the property of the District. The owner of this property had, so to speak, his day in court. Mr. Carlile Patterson, a man eminent in the scientific world, in the employ of the Government (and be it said to the credit of his memory that he did good service for the Government, receiving not an inadequate salary but a liberal one), lived for years after these taxes were levied, lived until after they were pledged to the payment of the so-called improvement bonds of the District, and subsequently died. Those taxes never have been paid, and there is now due on that property as taxes the sum of $50,000 and upward.

As to the exact hardship that may be involved in this matter I can not say; as to what the exact equities may be I can not say; as to what the circumstances of the widow of Carlile Patterson or of his heirs may be I can not say, for I do not know. All I want is for the House to understand, first, that these taxes were levied from ten to twelve years ago, were levied during the lifetime of Mr. Patterson, that years have elapsed and they are still unpaid; that they have been pledged with other taxes to the payment of these improvement bonds of the District, and now the widow or the heirs of Carlile Patterson ask relief.

It may be that there is an equity under which this relief should be granted. If that be true, then we ought to grant the relief by a direct appropriation; or rather we should understand when we grant this relief that we pledge the Government of the United States and the property of the District to the payment of this $50,000. If it be done at all, it ought to be put on the platform of exact equity and right.

I will say that from what little investigation I have been able to give to the subject I do not believe there is any greater equity for relief in this case than in many hundreds of other cases where the parties are more obscure and probably less able to pay. I did not rise to ask the gentleman about this matter for the purpose of injuring the bill, but in order, if I could by my questions, to enable the House to understand what the exact facts are.

Mr. HORR. Now just one moment in reply to my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], for he is naturally a fair man. Is it not possible that an assessment can be erroneously made upon property which will amount to actual confiscation? Such a thing is possible. I say that in this case the proof that it was done is beyond all question, from the fact that to-day this property if sold under the hammer would not bring enought to pay these old taxes. The benefit which it was claimed these improvements would make on this property did not occur, because if they had occurred the property would to-day feel it; it would be worth more, would it not?

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me another question?

Mr. HORR. Not now; your questions are so long. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Only a short question.

Mr. HORR. Very well; a short one.

Mr. CANNON. I do not know how short I can make it; possibly a minute.

Mr. HORR. Well, try your best. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. I will not try to compete with the gentleman when it comes to measuring arms in his peculiar arena. My only object in asking him about this matter is to get at the facts.

As a foundation for my question I want to say that if this bill passes, as I understand, the relief should be for the widow of Carlile Patterson. The suggestion has been made to me and I want to ask the gentleman whether or not it is true that this property is heavily mortgaged to third parties; if this appropriation is made the property will still be swept away from Mrs. Patterson, and this will practically be an appropriation for the benefit of the mortgagee? If that be so, while we are generous would it not make our generosity more effective by a direct appropriation to Mrs. Patterson?

Mr. HORR. I can not answer that question, for this is the first intimation I have had of anything of the kind in connection with this case. It does not seem to me that in investigating this matter we need to bother our heads about that.

If these taxes were levied through mistake, by inadvertence, or through misjudgment, contrary to good business principles, in such a manner as to act like a confiscation of the property of this widow woman, then I say we ought to give her this relief.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Is it not a fact that the property is valued to-day at $100,000 less than it was when these improvements were made by the District authorities?

Mr. HORR. It is appraised to-day at more than $100,000 less than it was when the work was done.

Mr. GUENTHER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HORR. I do not care how long this colloquy may go on provided the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR], by whose consent I occupy the floor, will yield me the time.

Mr. BARBOUR. It seems to me desirable for a proper understanding of the merits of this case that the explanation of the facts should be presented regularly by a member of the committee who has made them a special study and knows all about the case. I propose to yield a part of my time to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SPRIGGS].

Mr. SPRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, in the few minutes which I shall give to the discussion of the question before us I shall endeavor to explain to the committee the equities of this case as they have struck me and the committee by whom the claim has been examined.

In 1873 the property in question, belonging to Mrs. Patterson, was assessed at $223,605. Now, it may be said by gentlemen who oppose the passage of this bill that this assessment included other property than that to which it is claimed damages accrued by reason of these improvements; and that is true to the extent which I will state before I get through. This same property of Mrs. Patterson was in 1883 assessed by the assessors of the District of Columbia at $102,061, showing a depreciation of the property in ten years of $121,544. Now, I ask gentlemen of this committee whether they require any more evidence of the equity of the present claim than has been given? The property which the authorities of the District of Columbia attempted to improve, the property which they claimed to have benefited, assessing a heavy tax upon it on account of the supposed benefits, has in ten years decreased in value $121,544.

This bill proposes to refund to Mrs. Patterson the $53,000 which has been assessed—I should not say "refund;" but it is proposed to release this assessment which has not been paid for the best reason which anybody in the world can give—because the owner of the property has not been able to pay it. For the last two years, since the death of her husband, she has paid her assessment. The new valuation, as I have stated, is $102,061, and it was assessed the year before at $160,454. Upon this and upon the new assessment she has paid the taxes.

Mrs. Patterson comes here not asking a gift but asking simple justice—nothing more. The improvements which the District authorities undertook to make upon this property were just such improvements as amounted in fact to a confiscation of the property. I believe my friend who will perhaps follow me on this question will state that these lands to which this damage is claimed to have been done were farming lands; and it is claimed that for farming purposes they have been ruined. My friend said a few moments ago facetiously that he saw a cow grazing there. If so, she came there at the risk of her neck, for otherwise, according to my examination, she could not have got upon the property.

What is the simple question here? Have we the power, have we the right, to do what we propose to do by this bill? And is it justice to do it? Does Mrs. Patterson claim anything more than equity demands? If she does not, and if we have the power to grant this relief, is there a man in this House who has not the courage to do what is right?

Mr. WASHBURN. Will the gentleman tell us about the mortgage which is stated to be on the property?

Mr. SPRIGGS. There is a mortgage, I understand——

A MEMBER. How much?

Mr. SPRIGGS. Something like $20,000 upon the whole property—a mortgage which has been upon the property for a considerable length of time.

Mr. WASHBURN. Was not the property mortgaged in order to pay the taxes?

Mr. SPRIGGS. Possibly that may have been the fact; but I do not know it, and I will not state it. But the fact that there is a mortgage of $20,000 or $30,000 upon the property should not prevent us from doing justice.

Mr. GUENTHER. I see it is stated in the petition that in 1874 the most valuable portion of this property was heavily mortgaged in order to obtain funds for the payment of taxes.

Mr. SPRIGGS. If that is so, I am sure the gentleman who asked me the question will not vote to refuse this relief because of that mortgage.

Mr. WASHBURN. I only referred to that as indicating possibly the necessitous circumstances of this lady.

Mr. SPRIGGS. That being so, it is an additional reason why the bill should pass.

Mr. BUCKNER. Can the gentleman inform us whether Mrs. Patterson or anybody on her behalf ever presented her claim for damages before the board of audit?

Mr. SPRIGGS. It was never so presented. There was a board of audit, before which this claim might have been made. The excuse for not presenting it to the board is given in the report previously made in this case. This excuse will be best appreciated by gentlemen who knew Mr. Patterson. He neglected to present this claim before the board of audit, though claims to the number of several thousand were presented before that board, and over $800,000 was allowed by the board upon claims of this kind.

But though the party interested in this claim failed to push it before the board of audit, does that detract from its equity? If it would have been right for the board of audit at that time to allow the claim, is it not right for us to do so now?

Mr. Chairman, I never believe in talking for the sake of talk, and I do not know that I could say any more in favor of this claim if I should talk an hour.

I have given you salient points. I have shown you that in 1873 this property was assessed at $223,000 and in 1883 it was assessed at $102,000. I do not care if this occurred whether the damage was caused by these improvements. It has not been done because the property has depreciated in the last ten years to that extent. If you were sitting as a jury and the question was as to the lady's right to claim damages, in order to fix and show what the damages were I would put the assessors upon the stand to prove what the assessment was in 1873 and what it was in 1883, and then ask you as fair men to strike a balance between the two, and for compensation for the loss she has sustained by reason of these damages I would not ask you to remit to her $53,000, but I would ask you to give her the difference between $102,000 and $223,000; I would ask you to give her that difference of $121,544, and I do not believe there is a fair-minded man, a man who has the courage of his conviction, if that question were before him, who would hesitate a single moment to give her that amount. I trust there is no gentleman in this House who will hesitate to give her the relief we ask by the passage of this bill.

Mr. STRUBLE. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SPRIGGS. Certainly.

Mr. STRUBLE. If I remember the statement the gentleman made a moment ago, it was to the effect that there was a board of audit before which this class of claims could be taken for adjustment, and that a large amount of money was awarded by this board of audit to others who had similarly suffered, but that this claim was neglected. Now I should like to know the reason why?

Mr. SPRIGGS. I will tell you why.

Mr. STRUBLE. Why was this not adjusted like all the others?

Mr. SPRIGGS. It was because the husband of this lady thought so much more of his country than of his private business that out of devotion to his country's service he neglected to present his wife's claim for damages. Those who knew Carlile Patterson will say more on that subject than I have done. The only reason why the claim was not presented was because he was so much absorbed in the discharge of his public duties that he altogether neglected his private affairs.

Mr. GUENTHER. Let me interrupt the gentleman for a moment.

Mr. SPRIGGS. Certainly.

Mr. GUENTHER. At the time these injuries were inflicted Carlile Patterson, I understand, notified the commissioners he would institute legal proceedings. He did sue out an injunction, and thereupon the commissioners assured him compensation would be made if he would withdraw that suit.

Mr. SPRIGGS. So I understand. The gentleman from Michigan said in opening the debate that the board of audit were willing to agree the matter should be submitted to arbitration.

Mr. GUENTHER. But that never was done.

Mr. SPRIGGS. It was agreed between Carlile Patterson and the commissioners that they would arbitrate the question of damages. It was never done in his lifetime. When he died his family was left with this incumbrance.

Mr. STRUBLE. Do I understand there was an agreement upon the part of this lady or those interested for her in the property that there was to be no prejudice by reason of her claim not being prosecuted before this board of audit?

Mr. SPRIGGS. I will not say anything I do not know, and that is further than I am prepared to go.

Mr. STRUBLE. I ask for information. I desire to support this bill if I can do so intelligently and properly on the facts presented.

Mr. SPRIGGS. It was agreed and understood between the commissioners and Mr. Patterson that the matter should be arbitrated and settled. It never was done.

Mr. HOLMES. I understand this property has been assessed about $100,000 less in 1883 than it was in 1873.

Mr. SPRIGGS. One hundred and twenty-one thousand dollars.

Mr. HOLMES. What I wish to ask is whether other property in the vicinity depreciated in the same proportion.

Mr. SPRIGGS. I do not understand there is any other property in the vicinity, except it may be in small patches.

Mr. HORR. Property at the present time is about the same price it was in 1873. Thus the pendulum has swung back from 1873 to 1883 so that now the assessment rolls are a fair statement of the value of that property as compared with the value of property in 1883, and so shows the effect of these improvements upon it.

Mr. SPRIGGS. I desire to state for the benefit of the committee what is the fact. A mortgage was contracted to pay the taxes prior to 1874. It was contracted for the payment of those taxes, and the party interested in it will be released if this bill passes; that is, it is held for the payment of this money.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Now I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Is it not true that at the time these improvements were made this lady had a very valuable and very fine estate?

Mr. SPRIGGS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Is it not true also that, by the damages done to this property by these improvements, to-day if this tax is exacted the estate will be entirely confiscated and no property left?

Mr. SPRIGGS. That is true. From an examination which I have made myself, I am entirely satisfied that there is no gentleman on this floor who would go and look at that property and agree to give the amount of the tax that is now due upon it.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Is it not then a question whether or not we shall confiscate the estate?

Mr. SPRIGGS. That is practically the question.

Mr. MILLIKEN. That is the result of the question that is before the House?

Mr. SPRIGGS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLIKEN. That is all I wanted to bring out.

Mr. CANNON. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SPRIGGS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. I find in the petition of Mrs. Patterson the following statement:

> In 1874 the most valuable portion of the property was heavily mortgaged in order to obtain funds for the payment of taxes. All the resources of the owner were then exhausted. Consequently the taxes have accumulated to an extent far exceeding any present or prospective power of your petitioner to pay.

And further on the same page, 5, of the petition I find this language:

> In addition to the tax, the estate is encumbered with mortgages amounting to $35,000, $22,000 of which was paid as tax prior to 1874.

Now, what I wish to ascertain is whether that is the principal of the mortgage or the principal and interest.

Mr. SPRIGGS. That is the whole amount of the mortgage, as I understand it, although I am not able to answer the question fully. Twenty-two thousand dollars was paid as taxes prior to 1874.

Mr. CANNON. Was that the original amount of the mortgage?

Mr. SPRIGGS. I do not know.

Mr. CANNON. You have no means of answering the question as to whether this is the principal or the principal and accrued interest?

Mr. SPRIGGS. No. But I will say to the gentleman that it can not be important.

Mr. CANNON. But it is important.

Mr. SPRIGGS. The only fact with which we have to deal is as to the amount of this indebtedness, and not whether the lady is in debt aside from the debt she is laboring under by reason of the tax. Now, if she is relieved from this $53,000, no matter whether she owes other debts or not, she is relieved to the extent that she asks us to relieve her under the equities of the present case.

Mr. CANNON. I wish to state to the gentleman that if I vote at all for the bill it will be as a matter of relief for the widow of a man who did eminent service to his country and was eminent in the scientific world. The gentleman has just stated that in his opinion no member of this committee would be willing to give for this property the amount of the tax, namely, $50,000. Now, in this statement the petitioner sets forth that the mortgages on the property amount to $35,000. Whether this is the principal of the mortgage or the principal and interest combined I do not know, and the gentleman does not have the information at hand to answer the inquiry. But the query that is presented to us is, would not this lady be better served if the Government should grant her an annual pension of $2,000, which is 4 per cent. interest on $50,000, rather than by passing this bill? Is it not probably true that in the attempt to grant relief to this widow of an eminent man you are really passing a bill which would relieve the holders of this mortgage? We ought, therefore, to have that information in order to enable us to vote intelligently upon this bill.

Mr. MILLIKEN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CANNON. Yes, sir; with the permission of the gentleman who holds the floor.

Mr. BARBOUR. I desire to take the floor for a moment to reply to the question of the gentleman from Illinois with reference to this mortgage. I think I can answer him satisfactorily and with some authority, too. I understand that this lady, the widow of Mr. Carlile Patterson, desires this bill to be passed exactly in the shape in which it is presented here. This will not militate against her interest. These mortgages upon the property are in friendly hands and will not be used to her disadvantage. So that if there is any gentleman who wants to promote the interest of this lady let him vote for this bill.

Mr. CANNON. How much does this mortgage amount to?

Mr. BARBOUR. I do not know the exact amount, nor is it important.

Mr. CANNON. I think it is very important. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. MULDROW. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to run counter to what seems to be a prevalent idea. I dislike to oppose a measure which the House seems inclined to favor; but I do not think, if all of the facts are properly considered and understood by this committee, that they would give their assent to this bill, nor do I believe that they are prepared to intelligently pass upon the case from what has occurred up to this time. In the last Congress this bill, or a similar one, was before this House. At that time the bill was predicated upon the idea that this widow ought to be relieved from this tax which had accrued upon her property by reason and for the reason that her husband had rendered distinguished service to his country.

They at that time proposed to take from the District treasury a sum of money equaling nearly $50,000 to bestow upon the family of Mr. Carlile Patterson for services which he had rendered to the Government of the United States. That proposition was so unreasonable that the committee in this Congress places the claim upon a different idea, and that is, that while it may be true that you ought not to take this sum of money from the District treasury and bestow it upon the family of Carlile Patterson for services which he rendered the United States Government, yet his widow ought to be allowed the claim for damages which have accrued to her and her property by reason of certain city improvements.

I understand, Mr. Chairman, that in the history of this city, from its inception to the present, there was but a short period of time when any sort of damages were allowed to anybody in this city in consequence of improvements in the streets of the city. Up to 1874 no such claim was ever recognized by the courts of this District. Under the law of 1874 a board of audit was established, and under the provisions of the law establishing that board of audit they did consider certain claims for damages to property by reason of city improvements, and I believe that perhaps over 2,000 of those claims were presented and perhaps nearly as many persons obtained damages by reason of city improvements before that board. But the country was so impressed with the reckless manner in which that board of audit was receiving and acting favorably upon claims against the District that in 1876 Congress abolished it and destroyed that power to recognize or pass upon any such claims.

Now, sir, what are the merits of this very case? Here we find property that has reaped all the benefits of all the improvements of this city for the past ten or twelve years and yet has not paid one single farthing in the way of taxes for the support of the city government. The impression would prevail here, I presume, if the statements which were made were uncontradicted, that the whole of the property of this widow in this city and this District has been injured. Why, Mr. Chairman, there are only about twenty acres out of two hundred and twenty owned by this widow and her family in this District—only about twenty acres out of the two hundred and twenty that are intersected by streets of this city.

Mr. SPRIGGS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. MULDROW. Certainly.

Mr. SPRIGGS. The property the gentleman is now speaking of was assessed in 1873 at $94,000; in 1883, at $33,000; a difference between the assessments of the property of which the gentleman is now talking of $61,000; $9,000 more than the amount of taxes of which we propose to relieve this lady.

Mr. MULDROW. I hold in my hand a statement of the assessment upon the entire property, relief from the assessment upon which is now sought to be had. The statement extends from 1872 to 1884. In 1872 the value of the whole property was estimated at $216,146; in 1876, at $193,747; in 1879, at $158,510; and in 1884, at $100,947. And I am satisfied that there has never been a time when this particular property which they say has been damaged by reason of these city improvements has been much more than one-fourth of the value of the entire property owned by Mrs. Carlile Patterson.

Mr. SPRIGGS. If that be so, why did they assess that property at $94,000 in 1873? If it was only one-fourth the value of the whole, that would make the value of the whole property amount to $376,000.

Mr. MULDROW. I have here a map showing precisely the property in this case which has been penetrated by these street improvements, and it is shown that the whole property that is now claimed to have been damaged $60,000 never was worth $60,000 in its whole history. From 1879 to 1883 the entire valuation of that property within the city limits claimed to have been damaged was $53,832. The present valuation of that property is $29,036. And yet the extraordinary claim is here presented to this House that it had been damaged $60,000, when to-day it is only worth $29,000, and it never was assessed, so far as my information goes, at more than $53,000.

Mr. AIKEN. I desire to know from the gentleman from Mississippi what has reduced the monetary value of that property?

Mr. MULDROW. The reason is that of late years the house of the British minister has been erected in the western part of this city. The wealthy men who have come from a distance and located in Washington have built their mansions there. The tide has been from the east to the west. And the result is that at the end of ten years property is much less valuable in this and much more valuable in the western part of the city.

Mr. AIKEN. Has the value of the contiguous property decreased in the same proportion?

Mr. MULDROW. That is my understanding. I have here a statement from the commissioners of the District, in which they assert that if this case be acted upon favorably by this Congress it simply opens the door to hundreds who ought to be reimbursed upon a similar principle. There are thousands who have already paid their taxes and who have been damaged by reason of street and other city improvements. There are others, perhaps, who have not paid their taxes and who would come forward and demand the same relief. And you simply open the door to the presentation of claims aggregating, perhaps, millions against this city by the passage of a bill like this.

Mr. HUNT. Can we refuse such claims if they are just?

Mr. MULDROW. In reply to the gentleman from Louisiana, I will say the Supreme Court of the United States says that in nearly all of the States of this Union the right is exercised upon the part of a city government to make these street improvements, and no damage can be claimed by an owner who alleges he is injured. It is one of those cases, says the Supreme Court, where the principle of damnum absque injuria applies, where no private right has been invaded, but the city is exercising its right under its public functions to improve the property for the benefit of the people of the city.

Mr. SPRIGGS. This case is taken out of that rule by the appropriation of the property for the completing of that sewer.

Mr. MULDROW. Only one or two small squares are penetrated by the sewer. The great bulk of it is not touched by the sewer at all.

Now a word in regard to what is claimed to be the justice and equity of this case. Some years ago the stream that then ran at the foot of Capitol Hill, called Tiber Creek, ran through this precise and particular property. The city authorities diverted the Tiber Creek from that property and virtually reclaimed it. Yet the parties have paid the city nothing for that reclamation by the diversion of that stream. In these very grounds where they say ponds have been created by reason of the elevation of the streets constructed around the squares, right in some of these squares, the Tiber Creek once ran.

I am utterly unable to understand how we can recognize this claim without also recognizing the claims of hundreds and thousands of others, and thereby incurring an enormous debt upon the people of this District. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. HUNT] says, "Well, if these claims are just, and this debt should be incurred, then it is right for Congress to incur it." Where is the man among us who does not live in a community where at times perhaps extortionate taxation has been imposed upon some property, at least in the judgment of the owner of that property and in the judgment of others generally? Yet are we to go back a series of years and ascertain where property has been overassessed all over this land and compensate injured persons?

I remember a time when in my own State territory equalling whole counties was forfeited for non-payment of taxes that had been assessed and the property became the property of the State. Yet no citizen now proposes to go back and hold the State responsible by reason of this overassessment of property in times past and gone.

Mr. SPRIGGS. Was there no relief in those cases?

Mr. MULDROW. There never has been any relief in those cases. I have detained the committee somewhat longer than I expected. I have some letters here from the District commissioners which I will publish with my remarks. The purport of those letters is that the commissioners are opposed to the passage of this bill; they say that in justice to the people of this District a principle like this should not be established to vote money out of the District treasury in consequence of certain improvements made in the city in cases where property has been to some extent damaged.

In no event ought this bill to pass, because this Congress does not know, neither do the members of the Committee on the District of Columbia understand, the precise extent of the damage to this property. There is a plantation just beyond this which has not been damaged at all. There is property on the Brightwood road; there is also property in Georgetown, and lots in other parts of the city, which have not been damaged, all of which is owned by Mrs. Patterson. Yet you propose to release the whole property from taxation because some parts of it have been damaged by these improvements.

Mr. MCADOO. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MULDROW. Certainly.

Mr. MCADOO. If this case is a just one, and there are hundreds of cases in this District like it, why not introduce a general bill to meet all the cases?

Mr. MULDROW. That is precisely what ought to be done. If anybody is relieved it should be under a general law. I will reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I propose to make such a statement of the facts in this case and of the law of the case as was presented to the committee charged with its investigation and as will put the Committee of the Whole fully in possession of the merits of the bill on which they are now expected to vote. In doing that I will endeavor to answer fully the successive points made by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW], my colleague on the Committee on the District of Columbia.

In the beginning of his remarks he alluded to the fact that this bill now comes before the House in a different shape from the proposed legislation in the Forty-seventh Congress. I call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to the fact that the legislation proposed in the Forty-seventh Congress was a voluntary tribute of some of the most distinguished men in this country to the memory and services of Capt. Carlile P. Patterson. They filed their memorial in Congress asking that there should be some public recognition of the value of his immense services to the country; just as a few months previous thereto, or perhaps about the same time, there had been a public memorial and public recognition of the services of that distinguished man Professor Henry, of the Smithsonian Institution.

The special committee to whom that memorial was referred, after considering all the circumstances of the case, and finding that great burdens were resting upon the estate of the widow of Carlile Patterson, burdens which practically destroyed the value of that estate and left her in poverty, presented a report, which was accompanied by a bill substantially of the same character as that now proposed by the Committee on the District of Columbia. That bill passed the Senate with scarcely an objection and without a dissenting vote. It failed of passage in this House because it was impossible to get within three or four votes the number necessary to suspend the rules by a two-third vote and take up the bill. That was the action of the last Congress upon the very bill which the Committee on the District of Columbia has now formally presented. In their report they have given the grounds upon which they ask the House for its favorable consideration.

Just here I desire to answer some questions which from time to time have been propounded to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW] and to other gentlemen who have spoken in the course of this discussion. One is as to the character of other claims, and why this claim should be made a special one for the favorable consideration of the House.

And first I recall the fact that in 1871 Congress passed an act reorganizing the government of the District of Columbia, and establishing a board of public works, to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. That board of public works, consisting ostensibly of five members, but in fact, I believe, consisting of a single one, Mr. Shepherd, undertook this comprehensive scheme of public improvement here, and although originally bound down to the expenditure of no more than four or six million dollars, actually incurred a debt which, when it came to be audited, was found to be $20,000,000, or perhaps more than $20,000,000. In carrying out this extensive scheme of public improvements that board inflicted serious and in some cases almost irreparable damage upon a great deal of private property in the District of Columbia.

Now, I admit that the rule at common law is as the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] stated it two weeks ago in the discussion of the Carroll claim—that damages are not generally given for the act of a municipality in changing, altering, or improving the grades of streets. But that rule of the common law has been changed by statute in many of the States of this Union, because it is not coextensive with the demands of justice and equity; and it has been changed by many of the State constitutions, which have in terms declared that "private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation." In all of the States where such a provision exists, either in the statute or in the organic law, the courts have held that whenever damage is inflicted upon private property in the progress of just such improvements as were made here in the city of Washington, the public, who receive the benefit, must pay for those damages, and the burden can not be made to fall upon the individual whose property suffers.

In accordance with that principle of justice and equity the Legislature of the District of Columbia, on the 20th of June, 1872, passed an act entitled "An act providing for the payment of damages sustained by reason of public improvements or repairs." This act provided that—

> On the application in writing of the owner or owners of any real estate in the District of Columbia, or any person having other than a rental interest therein, to the board of public works, setting forth that special damages have been sustained by him or them in consequence of any improvements or repairs made by the said board, and particularly describing the nature of said damages, said board shall consider the statement of said application, and if deemed by them sufficient for that purpose, the said board or a majority thereof shall personally inspect the property alleged to be specially damaged, and make or cause to be made any examination connected with said improvements or repairs which they may deem necessary or proper.

This act of the Territorial Legislature of the District of Columbia was, as I have said, passed on the 20th of June, 1872. On the 20th of June, 1874, Congress abolished the then existing form of government in the District of Columbia, and in doing so provided a board of audit, consisting of the First and Second Comptrollers of the Treasury, who were directed to audit the debts of the former government. Among the claims which that act authorized to be presented to the board of audit were:

> Seventh. All unadjusted claims for damages that may have been presented to the board of public works pursuant to an act of the Legislative Assembly of the District of Columbia entitled "An act providing for the payment of damages sustained by reason of public improvements or repairs," approved June 20, 1872, which last-named claims shall severally be examined and audited without regard to any examination heretofore made.

The seventh section of this act provided for an issue of fifty-year 3.65 per cent. bonds, which were to be exchanged for the certificates allowed by the board of audit on this examination.

Now, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW] says that this board of audit proceeded in such a way as to provoke the indignation of the country at large, and that it was cut short in its work by the action of Congress abolishing the board. Sir, the record is exactly contrary to what the gentleman has stated. The act of June, 1874, to which I have just alluded, limited the time within which these claims might be presented to ninety days from the date of notification given to parties to present the claims. On the 21st of December, in the same year, Congress, instead of abolishing this board of audit, as the gentleman has said, because of dissatisfaction with its proceedings, passed a joint resolution extending for thirty days the time for the action of the board of audit.

Mr. MULDROW. Will the gentleman permit me a moment?

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. MULDROW. If the gentleman will examine volume 19 of United States Statutes at Large for 1875–'77, page 211, he will find that this board was abolished by the action of Congress.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. Of course it was abolished by the action of Congress after it was supposed it had performed its functions. But subsequently to the original act creating the board the time within which it could audit these claims was extended for thirty days; and it was moreover provided in the joint resolution that parties who had not presented their claims to the board of public works might present them to the board of audit. The language was that persons who had "sustained damages to real estate, but failed to present the same to the board of public works, may present the same for audit and allowance within the time above limited."

Thus not only was the board continued in existence for thirty days beyond the time originally fixed, but opportunity was given for the presentation of other claims than those which had been presented to the board of public works.

Here is the report of the board of audit made at the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress, showing that there were 2,208 cases presented to the board and examined by them, which claims, after charging the property-owners with the benefits derived from these improvements and assessing upon them the special-improvement taxes, were actually allowed to the amount of $827,625.68. This was over and above the assessment of special benefits and the assessment of special-improvement taxes upon the property. And upon examination of this list of 2,208 claims gentlemen will find that some of the property contiguous to this of Mrs. Patterson, property on the same square, was allowed special damages for the injury inflicted by these improvements, the damages, too, being large, as my friend from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR] suggests.

Now, sir, it has been said, and it is said by the commissioners in their letter to Colonel MULDROW, that if we relieve this case others will come. There is the proof that other cases have had their opportunity to be presented. They have had the ninety days before the board of audit and an extension of thirty days after that ninety had expired. There is proof in the report of the board of audit that 2,208 were examined. There may be some individual cases like that of Mrs. Patterson and like the Carroll case considered two weeks ago, which have some equities entitling them to the consideration of Congress and to be relieved from the statute of limitations imposed upon the board of audit in auditing these claims.

This is not simply a suit for damages, as suggested by my colleague, but largely for the correction of an erroneous and excessive assessment. Why was not this case considered before the board of audit? That is the question. This was her maiden property, which she inherited from her father. It was held for this lady by her husband as trustee She was under disability of coverture. She could not go before this board of audit and present her claim as other property-holders. The proof is before the committee her husband was so absorbed in pressing public duties that he neglected to attend to his private business and allowed the accumulation of these taxes against the estate of his wife.

I think I have stated everything necessary to be stated in reply to my colleague on the committee from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW]. I want to add so far as the commissioners of the District of Columbia are concerned they represent the defendant in this case. The committee attempted to have a judicial investigation of the merits of this case. They did not deem it necessary to consult the wishes of the defendant in rendering their judgment on the facts of the controversy. I am free to express my confidence in the commissioners of the District of Columbia and my personal respect for them from the official intercourse as a member of the committee I have had with them. It is but natural they should object as far as possible to the demands of past schemes, in order that they may carry out their own plans for the improvement and betterment of the city of Washington. It is perfectly natural they should desire to have as much of the funds of the city in order that they may show to those who come after themselves, in order that they may point out to the people as great results as possible from their administration. But I believe this case is one covered by justice and covered by equity, that it is a case entirely within the language of the act of the Territorial Legislature, and entirely within the language of the two successive acts of Congress which approved and confirmed that act of the Territorial Legislature. It was just such a claim as the board of audit would have acted on had it been presented to them when 2,208 of them were presented. I think I have explained to the committee the reason or excuse given by this lady, why she, helpless to act for herself, a feme covert, under this disability, was not able to present her own claims and have them acted on. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] I wish to yield five minutes to my friend from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RANDALL. I will detain the committee but a few moments. I was here during all the period to which the gentleman from West Virginia has referred—at the time of the organization of the board of public works and the board of audit and when these organizations were abolished. The latter had jurisdiction of claims like the one now under consideration. As I remember, that board audited more than a million of dollars of such claims. The Committee on the District of Columbia, after a careful examination, have reported to this House this case as founded in equity and justice. I believe that not only was there great damage done in this case by the cutting of streets, but that the owners suffered because of excessive assessments.

The manner as to how these excessive assessments were brought about by the act of 1878 can be thus illustrated. In this District the private property assessments were, say, $60,000,000, and they were added to by an increased assessment of 50 per cent., making $30,000,000 more, or $90,000,000 in all. Then the United States was rated $30,000,000 for public buildings, and $30,000,000 more for reservations, and $30,000,000 more for streets; the latter are vested in the United States; making in all $90,000,000; thus 50 per cent. to be paid by Government was fixed in law as being an equitable adjustment between the District and United States Government.

In this way this property was subjected to largely increased assessments in addition to damage done.

If there ever was a case showing damage and excessive assessment this is one of them. I have been on the ground and looked at the injury done, and therefore know of my own knowledge of the damage. This property, so far as the value of ownership is concerned, has become an injury to own, and can not with the incumbrances be sold at any price; and great trouble and expense would have been saved if the owners had parted with it long ago at mere nominal price.

A year ago a similar bill was introduced for the benefit of this lady. I supported it previously, giving it a careful and thorough investigation. I have not examined it since further than to carefully read the report and the provisions of this bill, and I have seen no reason which caused me to change the opinion I then formed that the claimant should be relieved, as was done by the Government during the existence of the board of audit in the 2,280 cases which came before that board. And here let me say that the Congress of the United States, when it abolished the board of audit, never thought to debar itself of the right at any time to investigate just such cases as this; and in more than one instance they have allowed sums of money under similar circumstances. I think from my own knowledge of this case that it is one possessing a high degree of merit; otherwise I would not support it.

This bill only relieves, as I understand, taxes levied by reason of excessive assessments, and grants nothing for damages in consequence of cutting of streets, and has the merit of securing to the Government an absolute release by claimant of all other claims heretofore in controversy between the Government of the United States and the early owner and the heirs, aggregating a sum much greater than the amount involved in this appropriation.

Mr. MULDROW. I desire to have a letter read from the District commissioners, which is very short, in reference to this point.

Mr. SPRIGGS. I rise to a point of order. I do not think the commissioners have any right to be heard here.

Mr. MULDROW. I ask that it be read as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. As a part of the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi the letter will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONERS DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, March 10, 1884.

SIR: As requested, the commissioners have carefully considered House bill No. 4689, for relief of Eliza W. Patterson, and recommend that it do not pass.

This is simply a case where the owner of a large amount of property has neglected to pay taxes until, with interest and penalties, they amount to a large sum. There are many similar cases. Justice and equity require all, having much or little property, to be treated alike, and many a poor man and woman have been compelled to pay the same rate of tax, with interest and penalty, or lose their property.

The petitioner in this case owns by inheritance from her father two farms in different parts of the county (aggregating two hundred and twenty acres), and many lots in different parts of Washington and Georgetown, all of which were, as the commissioners are informed, assessed according to their value the same as adjoining and other property, and not at all beyond their fair assessable value. The rate of taxation in Washington and Georgetown for 1874 was 2 per cent., in the county 1.58, while for 1875 it was 3, 2½, and 2 per cent., respectively; and for 1876 and 1877 it was all 1½ per cent. Now it is 1½ in the city and 1 per cent. in the county. Those were the rates for all people alike, and upon similar valuations. If, therefore, the taxes in question or any portion are released, equity requires that the same thing be done for all others, and those who have paid are entitled to a refund.

Second. The commissioners are informed that the petitioner urges claims for damage to the property caused by making street improvements. It is true that in grading the streets some of the lots were left below grade and possibly some above, but the courts have so often decided in similar cases that damages are not recoverable upon that ground that the commissioners assume they need not discuss the point. If a new rule is applied in this case why should it not be extended to all? To do that would require millions of money. The sewer that was constructed through a portion of the property is a circular one, six feet in diameter, laid in the bed of a small stream, and doing no damage to the property nor to the stream. It simply confines the stream to the sewer. As to the supposed injury to a spring, the commissioners think it rather imaginary than real. At least they are not aware of any injury of the kind having been caused by a District improvement. In any event, there was from June, 1874, to March, 1876, in session a board of audit to hear and adjust all claims for damages caused by reason of District improvements. If the supposed injury had been of an important character a claim therefor would doubtless have been presented. If it was presented and allowed or rejected, that should end the case. If not presented it was because it was not deemed of sufficient importance.

Third. The commissioners learn that it is urged that the late husband of petitioner was an eminent public officer, who performed most excellent service for the United States. All this is true, and it is quite possible that he was not paid in proportion to the good service he rendered. This, for the honor of the public service, may be said of many men who have won high distinction from the days of Washington to the present; but the commissioners fail to see what bearing that has upon this case. The service was rendered to the United States, and not to the District. If Congress deems it proper to make further recognition of those services at this time (concerning which the commissioners express no opinion), it is submitted that it should be by direct appropriation from the United States, and not taken out of the revenue of the District. To abate the taxes as proposed in this bill would be like canceling a mortgage on the property in payment for services rendered to the United States.

The commissioners submit herewith plats of the several parcels of property showing what improvements have been made; also a list of taxes, of which the following is a summary:

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| General tax | $23,412 49 | |
| Interest and penalties | 17,936 67 | |
| | | $41,349 16 |
| Special assessments | 6,280 14 | |
| Interest, approximate | 4,000 00 | |
| | | 10,280 14 |

No copies of the accompanying plats having been kept at this office, the commissioners would like them preserved and returned when no longer required by the committee.

Very respectfully,

J. B. EDMONDS, President.

Hon. HENRY L. MULDROW,
Of Committee for District of Columbia,
House of Representatives United States.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no further general debate the bill will now be open for debate and amendment under the five-minute rule.

Mr. BARBOUR. In order to perfect the text of the bill I move the adoption of the amendment reported by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert in line 6, after the word "eighty," the word "three;" so that it will read: "That all national, municipal, and county taxes, general and special, and all interests, costs, and penalties thereon, levied or assessed to and including June 30, 1883, upon the property," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. I move to strike out the last word, and for the purpose of saying a word in reference to the letter which has just been read from the commissioners. I regret, Mr. Chairman, that during the reading of that letter from the District commissioners, which contains the only positive statement of facts that we have been able to receive on this subject during this debate or from the committee, the attention of the committee was not more carefully directed to it.

As to the merits of Carlile Patterson I will not speak. There is no man here who has a greater appreciation of his merits or his services than I have, and if this was a proposition, pure and simple, to pay to his widow, on the ground of those distinguished services, an adequate sum, it would receive less objection at my hands than does the pending bill.

It is proposed here, in fact, on account of his distinguished service, but under the pretense of inequitable assessment, to release taxes upon property to the amount of $50,000, and establish a precedent that morally and equitably binds the Government to refund to people who have paid similar taxes the amount of same and release other taxes that may be unpaid.

Mr. DUNHAM. No; not that.

Mr. CANNON. Why not? The property of hundreds of others, in the aggregate amounting to over $1,000,000, has been as inequitably taxed, and I will say to my friend if this $50,000 is released it must be made up by taxing the property of the District to that amount, or rather half that amount, and appropriating the balance from the Treasury. A refusal to grant similar relief to others would be unfair, and would be outrageous when in addition you turn about and tax others, many of whom are compelled to labor from day to day to live, to give this gratuity to the representatives of Mr. Patterson. I feel compelled to vote against the bill.

Mr. BARBOUR. I move that the committee now rise and report the bill to the House with favorable recommendation.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I hope the gentleman will yield to me for a few moments.

Mr. BARBOUR. I withdraw the motion temporarily, and yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I desire to say a word only on this bill in reply to what has been said by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The CHAIRMAN. There is nothing pending.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I am opposing the amendment of the gentleman to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no pending amendment, as the Chair understands it.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Then I move to add a word to the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will be heard upon his amendment.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I understand this is a proposition to relieve the widow of one of the most distinguished scientists that has ever lived in this country. She has before Congress claims amounting to about $200,000 on account of her father's estate. The water that we drink here at the Capitol, as I am informed, comes from a stream on which her father owned a mill-site, which has been destroyed. She proposes to relinquish all claim to this $200,000, which claim is now before the several committees of Congress.

Mr. MULDROW. Will you permit me a word just there? I think the gentleman is laboring under a misapprehension.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Wait until I complete the sentence. She proposes to relinquish all right to the $200,000 claimed, and now pending before various committees, on account of her father's estate, if this Congress will relieve her from the payment of about $50,000 tax now resting upon the property in this city, which has been rendered almost valueless by the city improvements described by the gentleman from Michigan and others.

Now that property, which ten years ago was valued at over $200,000, has decreased in value until to-day it is valued at only $100,000; and a gentleman who has visited the spot testifies that if a cow were to attempt to go on the land she would go at the risk of breaking her neck.

It does seem to me that when a man was so devoted to public duty as the deceased husband of this lady was confessedly on all sides, neglecting his own private estate and his own family for the sake of science and his public duties, we ought to relieve the distresses of the widow and the orphans in a case like this.

I have thought it my duty to say this much, because last session I was not convinced under the half-hour's debate we then had that it was a meritorious case, and under a misapprehension I voted against it. But I think it my duty now to vote for it.

I now yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW].

Mr. MULDROW. I wish to say that no such claim was presented to Congress as the gentleman from Kentucky has indicated. There was some claim of that character, but not for the amount.

Mr. BARBOUR. I move that the committee rise and report the bill as amended with a favorable recommendation to the House.

Mr. MULDROW. I call for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 142, noes 28.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4689) for the relief of Eliza W. Patterson, and had instructed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment.

Mr. BARBOUR. I demand the previous question on the amendment and the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is first on the amendment as reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The question being taken, the Speaker stated that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. CANNON. I call for a division. But we may as well have the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were ayes 26—not one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. CANNON. Count the other side.

The negative vote was counted, and there were—noes 129.

So (the affirmative not being one-fifth of the whole vote) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the passage of the bill.

A division was called for.

The House divided; and there were ayes 118, noes 35.

So (further count not being called for) the bill was passed.

Mr. BARBOUR moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. SNYDER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (S. R. 64) providing for the addition of $10,000 to the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. BLAND. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHERMAN in the chair) laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the 13th instant, a report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office regarding the application of the Union Pacific Railroad Company for a portion of the Fort Wallace reservation, in the State of Kansas; which, on motion of Mr. VAN WYCK, was, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I present resolutions of the Jacksonville (Fla.) Board of Trade, favoring the continuance of the fast-mail system to the South Atlantic States. The resolutions state that the discontinuance of the fast service will involve the loss of a business day to that whole section, which is visited annually by thousands of visitors from all sections of the country; that it will deprive them of postal facilities which have been enjoyed for nearly three years and to which their business has become adjusted; and that it will retard the development of a section of country which is paying rapidly increasing revenues to the Post-Office Department of the General Government. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KENNA. I present a memorial of citizens of Baltimore, Md., remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. 1441) to authorize the construction of bridges across the Great Kanawha River and to prescribe the dimensions of the same. REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HARRISON. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1449) to provide for the sale of the military reservation on the island of Bois Blanc, in the Straits of Mackinaw, in the State of Michigan, and for other purposes, to submit an adverse report thereon. Mr. FRYE. By an order of the Senate the Committee on Rules was directed to construe clause 3, Rule XXXIII, which provides for the admission of heads of Departments to the floor of the Senate. The committee have unanimously instructed me to report that their construction of the rule limits the admission to members of the Cabinet.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be printed and laid on the table.

Mr. FRYE. A resolution submitted by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] on the 12th of February, conferring upon the President of the Senate authority to admit to the floor of the Senate on the request of Senators eminent citizens from the several States and Territories was referred to the Committee on Rules. I am instructed by the committee to report adversely on the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator make any motion in reference to it?

Mr. FRYE. I move that the resolution be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. A communication from S. A. Groff in the nature of a petition was referred to the Committee on Rules asking the adoption by the Senate of his invention known as "the Groff voting-indicator and page or messenger call." The committee have made no examination whatever of the merits of this invention, but have unanimously concluded that no such indicator is necessary for the use of the Senate, and therefore report adversely to the prayer of the petitioner.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee will be discharged from the further consideration of the petition, and it will lie on the table.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1108) to provide for the sale of the Iowa Indian reservation in the States of Nebraska and Kansas, for the issuance of a patent for a reservation for the Iowa tribe of Indians in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

SPECIAL ATTORNEYS OF DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK], which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas on the 23d of January, 1884, the Senate adopted the following:

"Resolved, That the Attorney-General be directed to inform the Senate when and by whom the compensation for special attorneys in the star-route cases in the District of Columbia was fixed, and to furnish copies of any agreements or memoranda relating thereto, and if in his judgment the compensation is unreasonable, why he ratified and continued the same. Whereas no reply has been made thereto: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be directed to furnish the information demanded or give his reasons for neglecting or refusing so to do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

NEZ PERCÉ INDIAN WAR.

Mr. SLATER. On the 8th day of March the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN] reported adversely the bill (S. 512) for the relief of citizens of Oregon, Washington, Idaho, and Montana who served in connection with the United States troops in the war with the Nez Percé Indians and for the relief of the heirs of such as were killed in such service, and for other purposes, and on his motion it was indefinitely postponed. MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 4689) for the relief of Eliza W. Patterson; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 74) to enable the State of Colorado to take lands in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections found to be mineral lands, and to secure to the State of Colorado the benefit of the act of July 2, 1862, entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts."

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (S. R. 64) providing for the addition of $10,000 to the contingent fund of the Senate.

SALARIES OF DISTRICT JUDGES.

Mr. HOAR. I move to take up the bill (S. 1852) fixing the salaries of the several judges of the United States district courts at $5,000 per annum.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chief Clerk will report the pending question on the bill.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the bill a new section:

SEC. 2. No judge of any district or circuit court of the United States or officer by him appointed shall appoint to any office or employment in or pertaining to any court presided over by such judge any person related to him by affinity or consanguinity within the degree of first cousin; and any person guilty of a violation of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

Mr. INGALLS. It is not clear from the language what the intention of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] is with regard to the penalty that is affixed to a violation of this provision requiring judges not to appoint as officers of their court or to places of trust or emolument persons who are related to them.

Mr. HOAR. I accepted the language of the Senator from Texas [Mr COKE].

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Massachusetts says the language is that of the Senator from Texas, and it is obscure.

Mr. COKE. I wish the Senator would speak louder. I am not able to hear him.

Mr. INGALLS. I was calling attention to the fact that the penalty for the violation of this provision with regard to the appointment by judges of persons related to them to positions of profit and trust is not clearly defined. Is it the design that this shall be an impeachable offense or that if a judge does this he shall be arrested and fined before a justice of the peace?

Mr. COKE. It is the design to make it an impeachable offense.

Mr. INGALLS. Then I submit that the language of the Constitution ought to be used. Section 4 of article 2 prescribes that—

The President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

In the latter part of the clause "high crimes and misdemeanors" of course must be taken together, and I assume that a judge of a United States court would not be removable by impeachment unless it was expressly so declared for committing what is commonly known in law as a misdemeanor.

Mr. HOAR. If I may be permitted by the Senator I will state that I accepted that, hoping that it would facilitate the passage of the bill and seeing no objection to it. I think it would be better left out, but I think that the deliberate and willful violation of a statute of the United States in the use of his official power of appointment would be, even if it were not so expressed in the statute, such a misdemeanor as would make it clearly an impeachable offense. I think it would be a high misdemeanor.

Mr. INGALLS. I think it would if it were not otherwise declared in the statute. It appears to me that the statute simply declares it shall be a misdemeanor, not a high crime and misdemeanor that would justify removal by impeachment.

Mr. HOAR. I think the Senator's point is a good one.

Mr. INGALLS. Of course the word "misdemeanor" has a well defined and ascertained significance in law, and I should say that if this amendment were adopted in its terms a judge violating the provisions of the amendment would not be removable by impeachment; he would be merely punishable by either fine, or imprisonment in the county jail, or something of that kind, as might be provided elsewhere by law.

Mr. HOAR. I think myself that the language making it a misdemeanor weakens and not strengthens the penalty; but I took the will of the Senator from Texas, who is the author of the amendment.

Mr. COKE. If the Senator will permit me, I will say that I simply desire to make that section effective; and if either the Senator from Kansas or the Senator from Massachusetts will suggest an amendment that will probably improve it I shall be very glad.

Mr HOAR. I would leave out that part of the sentence and make the prohibition. It seems to me very clear that if a judge is prohibited from appointing a relative to office and nothing more, the willful disobedience to that statute would be a matter of impeachment as clear as anything could be.

Mr. INGALLS. I agree fully with the Senator from Massachusetts that that would be the case if the latter clause were omitted, which reads as follows:

And any person guilty of a violation of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

The effect of that to my mind will be that he will not be impeachable for a violation of the provisions of the section, but will simply be punishable for the commission of misdemeanor, unless you use the language employed in the Constitution "guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor." In that event it would be an impeachable offense.

Mr. COKE. If the Senator from Kansas moves to strike off the latter clause so far as I am authorized to do so I accept it.

Mr. INGALLS. I think that had better be omitted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the proposition to be to leave off the last clause, "and any person guilty of a violation of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor."

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to hear the amendment as it has been modified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment as modified will be reported.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 2. No judge of any district or circuit court of the United States or officer by him appointed shall appoint to any office or employment in or pertaining to any court presided over by such judge any person related to him by affinity or consanguinity within the degree of first cousin.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts whether it would not be well to except out of the operation of this amendment the office of clerk of the court. While there may be a manifest propriety in providing against the appointment of relatives of the judge to offices like that of receiver, commissioner, master in chancery, and so on, I can not see any reason why a judge may not appoint a relative to the office of clerk. I do not see any reason why there should be an exception made against judicial officers in this particular, when it is not made in regard to ministerial officers, such as heads of Departments.

Mr. HOAR. I was very sorry that the Senator from Texas desired to add this clause to the bill. I thought it did not belong here, and would belong better on a bill which will come in undoubtedly within a few days. But the Senator thought otherwise. While I was sorry that it came onto this bill, because it delayed its passage, as it has been seen, I still think the amendment is right in principle, and therefore it being offered, and especially having been modified by the Senate, the necessary time having been given to it, I shall vote for it.

There are certain cases where I think it is very proper for public officers to appoint their near relatives to offices within their gift. Take the case of clerk to a Senator under the recent resolution. Though I should be very sorry to have a near relative of mine come to Washington on any such errand, yet it is a confidential relation, where the main duty of the officer is to do something which requires the entire confidence, the knowledge of the correspondence, the knowledge of the relations to other men, social, personal, and private, as well as public, as the private secretary of the President of the United States.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Or of a Cabinet officer.

Mr. HOAR. John Adams appointed his son his private secretary. It was a very proper thing to do. I believe it has been done in more recent times by both the two last Presidents, certainly one of them. That is very proper; but when you come to the clerk of a court, it seems to me, in the first place, that the whole bar ought to have a right to a fair and impartial consideration by the judge as to who is the best man. The office of clerk is a very important office, requiring very important and rare gifts. Lord Bacon says that "the clerk is the finger of the court, and on his quality dependeth the dispatch of business therein;" and it is true. The judge has to deal with the clerk's accounts. Ordinarily, in most cases, the judge taxes bills of costs and fees in which the clerk has an interest.

Mr. COKE. If the Senator will permit me, the judge frequently must grant allowances for the clerk's services.

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. COKE. The judge must frequently decide on motions to retax costs and judgments.

Mr. HOAR. That is exactly what I was saying. The Senator says it in better language, but that is the precise idea I was this moment offering: that the judge has to tax bills of costs and impose burdens upon the parties in which the clerk has an interest. I think, therefore, there is a great reason for putting a stop to the practice, although it might bear hardly in one or two individual cases. I do not know of any individual case where it operates.

Mr. MILLER, of California. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, let me inquire, has there been within the knowledge of the Senator any abuse of this power of appointment?

Mr. HOAR. Never in the slightest degree; on the contrary, one of the best and most venerable judges we ever had in Massachusetts had as the clerk of his court his son, who was one of the best clerks we ever had in the United States court; I speak of Judge Sprague. I never in my own experience have had any knowledge of any complaint; but the Senator was not here, probably, during the debate yesterday, when Senators got up and stated one after another their knowledge of complaint.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Yes, I was here; that was in relation to commissioners and receivers and so on. My attention is called to this matter by the fact that the district judge at San Francisco appointed his brother (who had been a gallant officer in the Union Army and served with great distinction) clerk of his court. We have not found that there has been any abuse of his privileges or his rights as a clerk, but in fact he has been the best clerk in that court we have ever had. So unless there is some reason for general legislation upon this subject I should be against it. I can not see that the relation of the judge to the clerk is of any more intimate character than that of private secretary to the Secretary of the Treasury, or private secretary to the President of the United States, or the chief deputy or private secretary of a collector of customs; but if we are going to start out upon the theory that neither judicial nor ministerial officers shall appoint any relatives to office, let us make a general law on the subject and apply it to all, and not make a distinction as against the judiciary.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, it appears to me that this amendment is straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel. I agree with the Senator from California that we ought to deal with this matter by a general law. It has been said that he who does not take care of his own household is worse than an infidel; but it is my opinion that men who use public position for the purpose of placing their relatives in places connected with the public Treasury which they would not receive except for the fact that they are so in position is, to say the least, indelicate and improper.

So far as the clerk of the court is concerned the argument that the Senator from Massachusetts makes does not apply. The relation is not of a confidential character with the judge. It should be an adversary position.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me; I do not wish to take up his time. What I said was that there were certain clerkships, like the private secretary of a Senator, where it would be very proper to appoint a relative, because the clerk must necessarily have intimate dealing and be in a confidential relation with the officer appointing him in a very large degree; but that did not exist in the case of clerks of courts, where the relation was wholly public.

Mr. INGALLS. I did not hear the Senator say that, and I fully agree with the expression he has just made that there is no reason why the clerk of a district or circuit court should be in confidential relations with the judge; on the contrary, the relations should not be confidential. The judge should occupy an adversary position, he should be a restraining power upon the clerk, because there are many cases arising in which the relations of the clerk are opposed to those of litigants, and it appears to me obvious that this amendment ought not to except clerks; it should be a sweeping condemnation of the whole practice. Therefore, although I believe that the amendment proposed would be better if left from this bill and offered upon some general bill that should deal with the whole subject, I can still see reasons why it ought to be adopted, because there have been within my own observation cases occurring where serious difficulties and embarrassments have resulted to the administration of justice by the appointment of near relatives of judges to the positions of clerks, masters in chancery, and auditing and accounting officers; a practice that ought to be abolished.

Mr. COKE. I presume that there is no lawyer who has ever practiced before a Federal court whose experience does not agree with that of the Senator from Kansas. I have known myself personally, and I know from information from others, of a great many instances of abuse arising solely out of the fact that an officer of the court was a near relative of the judge. It is a well-known fact that the Federal judges, holding their offices for life, irresponsible to the people, who can not be removed, make a practice—there are exceptions, of course, but in my State the exceptions have been extremely rare—of appointing their near relatives, who get rich in these offices given them by their judicial relative, and they grow rich at the expense of the people. They grow rich frequently because men will submit to wrongful bills of costs before they will take issue and possibly endanger their causes before the judge by taking issue with his relative who is the clerk.

I have seen much of that, Mr. President. The people of my State have suffered from it, as I remarked yesterday. Of all the Federal judges who have sat upon the bench since 1845, when Texas was annexed, but a single one has been free from this charge of nepotism, and that honorable exception is Judge A. P. McCormick, the present judge of the northern district of Texas. I have never heard of his appointing a relative to any office. I do not know any other who has sat upon the Federal bench whose relatives have not been enriched by official appointments from the judges. It has been a ground of loud and deep and continuous complaint. That complaint was voiced in a memorial which I presented on the second day of the meeting of this Congress, sent here by the United States attorney for the western district of Texas, in which he asked for legislation prohibiting this condition of affairs.

Now, Mr. President, I should have been perfectly willing for this matter to have been embraced in a separate bill, and I referred it to the Judiciary Committee and asked that this be done. It is there, and nothing has been done with it. It seemed to me that this bill presented an opportunity for remedying this abuse. It is now before the Senate. The amendment has been modified until it meets general acceptance. I see no reason why it should be laid aside now to be rediscussed and redebated hereafter when we can pass on it now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Texas as modified.

Mr. HOAR. I hope we may have a vote now.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Shall the bill be engrossed for a third reading?

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, this bill raises very greatly the salaries of the judicial officers mentioned in it. On a former occasion I pointed out some objections to this increase of salaries. I called the attention of the Senate and of the country to the salaries paid to these officers during the earlier and I fear the better days of this Republic. I stated that this bill in some instances made the salaries six or seven times larger than they were at that time, in other instances double, and in others a very large increase. I was answered by two Senators on that subject by this statement, that the cost of living in the latter part of the last century and in the early part of this was very much lower than it is now. The statement was made that it cost three times as much to live now as it did then. I asked the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND], who was one of those who made this statement, upon what authority he made it. The answer he gave had reference alone to his personal experience. The answer was contrary to what my convictions were as to the truth of the matter.

Since that time I have taken occasion as far as the resources of the statistics in the Congressional Library offered facilities to look into this charge of low prices for the necessaries of life in the latter part of the last century and in the early part of this, as compared with the present prices; and the result is, as I will show briefly to the Senate, that in all the substantials of life, all the necessaries and comforts of life, the prices were higher during Washington's and the elder Adams's administration than they are now. I allude especially to provisions, things consumed by men. Of course we all know as to clothing that the improvements in labor-saving machinery, the invention of the sewing-machine, have greatly reduced the prices of those necessary articles. As to fuel, I have looked into that, and the price of coal is now less than it was during the administration of Washington. As to rents, I admit that in the large cities like Boston and New York and Philadelphia, and the like, rents have gone up very enormously; but I have not objected to the increase of the salaries of the judges who resided in these large cities and were compelled to pay these rents. The rents in the rural districts, in the non-manufacturing and non-commercial States, are as low now as they ever were, and are lower than ever before in the South.

Now, sir, I propose to show to the Senate some statistics on this subject. Beef per barrel was worth in 1795 $13; in 1796 it was worth $14; in 1834 it was worth $8.50; and the average price of beef for the forty years commencing in 1795 and ending in 1834 was $10.25 per barrel. In the last ten years the price of beef has been less than $10.25 per barrel.

Take the article of corn, a very necessary article. In 1795, 1796, and 1797 it was worth $1 per bushel and over. That was the lowest price. The average price for the forty years from 1795 to 1834 was 86½ cents per bushel. In the last ten years it has never been as high as this average, except in 1882, when there was a drought and corn was exceptionally high.

Take the article of coffee. In 1795, 1796, and 1797 it was worth respectively 21, 25, and 26 cents per pound, and the average price for the forty years up to 1834 was 22 cents. For the last ten years it has not been up to that average.

Take the article of sugar. In 1795 it was worth 14 cents per pound. It went as high as 17 cents in 1816 and never got as low as 10 cents till 1820. Now the price is from 6 to 8 cents. So there has been a fall in the price of sugar; and so important is this article in domestic economy that I have but to call the attention of the Senate to a speech made by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] during the last winter, in which he showed that the expense in a boarding-house for factory operatives for sugar was the principal item of expense.

Take pork——

Mr. GIBSON. If the Senator will permit I should like to interrupt him for a moment on the subject of sugar.

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. GIBSON. I wish to say in relation to sugar that the sugar tax to the people of the United States is 88½ cents per capita per year, and no more.

Mr. GEORGE. I want the Senator from Louisiana to understand that I am merely comparing the price of sugar now and in the latter part of the last century and the first part of this.

Take pork, sir. In 1795 it was $18 per barrel; in 1801 it was $26; in 1808 it fell to $15, and was never as low as $15 again until 1820, and then it was $14.50. The average price for the forty years from 1795 to 1834 was $16.99 per barrel. It is less than that now.

Take flour, a very essential article of support. The average price of a barrel of flour from 1795 to 1834 was $8.51. In 1795 it was $12; in 1796 it was $16; in 1801 it was $13; in 1817 it was $14.75, the average being, as I have stated, $8.51. It is now and has been for a long time much lower than that.

Take wheat. My statistics of wheat do not go beyond the year 1806; I can not find them beyond that time. In that year the average price of wheat was $1.35; in 1807, 1808, and 1809 it was $1.25 per bushel; in 1810 it was $1.50 per bushel; in 1811 it was $1.75 per bushel; whereas the price to-day in Chicago is about 98 cents.

Take rice, another article of consumption. In 1795 it was worth 7 cents per pound; in 1796 it was worth 8 cents per pound, and the average for the forty years from 1795 to 1834 was $4.61 per hundred or 4.61 cents per pound, and this average was caused by the low price from 1820 down. Before that time it was higher. The average for the last ten years would be but very little more.

Take the article of fuel. In 1825 anthracite coal was from $8 to $11 per ton. It never got lower than $6 until 1833. Then it rose again, and it is now regularly under $5 per ton.

So it will be seen that the excuse that it costs more to live now than it did formerly is no valid reason for the passage of this bill. On the contrary, Mr. President, the statistics show that the prime articles of necessity are lower now than they were the latter part of the last century and the early part of this.

So, Mr. President, I insist that this bill shall not be passed upon that ground. If we are to pass it upon any other ground, let that ground be stated. It must not go through upon the false pretense that it costs more to live now than it did formerly; it costs less. I merely desired to present these facts to the Senate in answer to the position taken by the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Oregon. Having stated that, I have done all I intended to do.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FARLEY (when Mr. CAMDEN's name was called). The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN] is absent, and I am paired with that Senator on this question. If he were present, I understand that he would vote for the bill and I should vote against it.

Mr. COCKRELL (when his name was called). The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] spoke to me in regard to a pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN].

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. If the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN] were present he would vote in favor of this bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. And he wants to pair with me?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. He does.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Minnesota is necessarily absent, not able to get here, and desires to pair with me. If he were present, he would vote "yea," as I am informed, and I should vote "nay."

Mr. HAMPTON (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY]. Were he present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). As to this bill I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. WALKER], who I understand would vote for the bill. I should vote against it.

Mr. LAMAR (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON], who is for the bill.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 42, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—42.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. HOAR. As there has been an addition to the bill, it would be well to add to the title "and for other purposes."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the bill will be amended so as to read: "A bill fixing salaries of the several judges of the United States district courts at $5,000 per annum, and for other purposes."

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COKE. I gave notice that when this bill just disposed of was taken up I should ask the Senate to return to the Calendar and proceed with Order of Business 158. I believe it is about the first case that was reached on the Calendar. It is a bill of some importance, and I ask unanimous consent to have it considered now.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The bill to which the Senator from Texas refers will, I think, be reached within a few minutes in the regular call of the Calendar. I hope hereafter during the morning hour that no Senator will feel called upon to move to take up a bill out of its order. I hope the Senator will not make the motion, but will allow the Senate to proceed with the Calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. COKE. I am entirely willing to proceed with the Calendar if no other bill is taken up out of its order.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Very well; no other Senator has moved to take up one.

Mr. COKE. I withdraw the motion.

BUREAU OF LABOR STATISTICS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the eighth rule the first bill in order is Order of Business No. 142, being Senate bill 140.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 140) to establish a bureau of statistics of labor, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. GARLAND to substitute for the bill the following section, to be added after section 342 of the Revised Statutes:

SEC. 343. The chief of the Bureau of Statistics shall, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, annually collect and report to Congress the statistics relating to marriage and divorce in the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia, and pertinent information relating to all departments of labor and production in the United States, especially touching the pecuniary, industrial, social, educational, and sanitary condition of the laboring classes, and to the permanent prosperity of the productive industry of the whole country; and the salary of the chief of such bureau shall be $3,500.

Mr. BAYARD. We are under the five-minute rule?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. We are.

Mr. BAYARD. This bill, it is evident, can not be discussed in that time. I therefore suggest that it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator objects. Under the rule the bill will go over.

Mr. CALL. Does the bill retain its place on the Calendar? I desire that it shall not be displaced on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will take its place under Rule IX. The next bill will be reported.

CREDENTIALS OF SENATORS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. 2) to amend chapter 1 of the Revised Statutes in reference to the election of Senators in Congress.

Mr. HARRIS. That seems to be an adverse report. Let it go over.

Mr. GARLAND. Let me make a statement.

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly; I withdraw the objection.

Mr. GARLAND. This bill was reached once before, and I did not insist on its being acted upon then on account of the absence of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], who was away from the Senate on duty at that time. I think it possibly a matter that we can dispose of now in a very short time. It is a very important matter to the Senate. It is a question of regulating the certificates of the election of Senators. If it suits the convenience of any Senator to have it passed over now I shall not object, but I should like to have it retain its place on the Calendar, so that at some time we may have a vote on the bill. This is the third time I have drawn the attention of the Senate to it. If the Senator who reported the bill thinks we can not get through with it this morning, let it go over.

Mr. HARRIS. I interpose no objection.

Mr. PUGH. I am satisfied from the character of the questions that will arise upon this report that it can not be disposed of under the five-minute rule. It is a very important measure, and if action on it is desired by the Senator from Arkansas I have no doubt there will be some debate on it, and it had better pass over to some other day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama objects. The next bill on the Calendar will be reported.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. 176) to protect employés and servants engaged in foreign and interstate commerce and employés and servants in the District of Columbia and the Territories of the United States.

Mr. DOLPH. That bill is a bill which can not be properly discussed under the five-minute rule, and I object to its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon objects to the consideration of the bill, and it goes over. The next in order will be stated.

Mr. GEORGE. In reference to the bill just passed over on the objection of the Senator from Oregon, I think he said it could not be considered under the five-minute rule. It is a very important measure and very much desired by the people of this country. I should like to have it made the special order for some early day, not to conflict, however, with any special orders already made; and I would ask that it be made a special order for two weeks from next Monday. That will give time for all the others to be disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi moves to make Senate bill 176 the special order for Monday, April 14.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to hear what the bill is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be again read by the title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 176) to protect employés and servants engaged in foreign and interstate commerce and employés and servants in the District of Columbia and the Territories of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi moves to make this bill a special order for the time named by him.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I hope that we shall not make any more special orders. This bill I suppose is an important bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the duty of the Chair to inform Senators that the present occupant of the Chair thinks that under the new rules it is not in order to debate a motion of this kind, although upon that question there is some doubt, and the Chair would prefer to submit it to the Senate. He will take the opportunity of calling the attention of Senators to it.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Rather than spend time in submitting it to the Senate, I will not claim the right to debate it at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks it a question of doubt, and therefore he hopes his view will not be considered as a precedent until the matter is settled by the Senate. The Chair thinks it is a somewhat doubtful question.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. On the question of making the bill a special order I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 17, nays 35; as follows:

YEAS—17.

HOLIDAYS FOR GOVERNMENT LABORERS.

The joint resolution (S. R. 32) providing for the payment of laborers in Government employ for certain holidays was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported from the Committee on Education and Labor with an amendment, which was, after the word "thanksgiving," in line 10, to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That said employés shall be paid for these holidays only when clerks and other salaried employés of the Government Departments shall be so paid: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall authorize any additional payment to such employés as receive annual salaries.

And to insert:

And shall receive the same pay as on other days.

So as to make the resolution read:

That the employés of the navy-yard, Government Printing Office, Bureau of Printing and Engraving, and all other per diem employés of the Government on duty at Washington, or elsewhere in the United States, shall be allowed the following holidays, to wit: The 1st day of January, the 22d day of February, the 4th day of July, the 25th day of December, and such days as may be designated by the President as days for national thanksgiving, and shall receive the same pay as on other days.

Mr. BAYARD. Is there a report accompanying the resolution?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no written report. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 385) for the relief of D. C. Allen was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I object to that and the next bill being considered, the reports being adverse.

Mr. FRYE. Is there any reason why they can not be disposed of and got off the Calendar?

Mr. COCKRELL. The parties are waiting to present additional facts to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senate bill 385 and the bill (S. 352) for the relief of Thomas H. Reeves will go over on the objection of the Senator from Missouri.

LANDS IN SEVERALTY TO INDIANS.

The bill (S. 48) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations and to extend the protection of the laws of the States and Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. DOLPH. That is a bill of great importance, and various amendments are reported by the committee. I do not think it can be satisfactorily discussed under the five-minute rule, and I object to its consideration at present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill, being objected to, goes over under the rule.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator from Oregon allow me to state to him that this bill has been considered at two successive sessions of the Senate, and passed the Senate during the last Congress without debate after having been changed as it is now proposed to be changed? It is of very great importance to the Indians. It has received the unanimous report of the committee and also the support of the Indian Bureau and the Interior Department.

Mr. DOLPH. If the Senator asks me to do so I withdraw my objection.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] has had charge of this bill for three consecutive sessions of the Senate.

Mr. COKE. I will say to the Senator from Oregon that this bill was discussed some fifteen or twenty days in the Forty-sixth Congress. In the light of that discussion, in the Forty-seventh Congress it was amended in the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back to the Senate favorably, and passed the Senate without debate. It went to the House of Representatives and lay on the House Calendar without ever being reached. It was introduced into the Senate as soon as this Congress met, went to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and has had added to it two or three amendments that do vary the original bill, but very little. It meets the unanimous concurrence of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

As I understand, its passage is very much desired by the Secretary of the Interior. It will supersede the necessity of a great many special bills applicable to different tribes before the committees of the two Houses if it can be passed at once.

I do not believe that the bill will give rise to any discussion. If it does, there must be somebody here who will take a different view of it from that which was unanimously taken in the Forty-seventh Congress, when it passed without debate.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to state my reasons for objecting to the bill, I will state that I had intended to propose some amendments to the bill, but I have been so much occupied that I have been unable to prepare them. In the main I agree with the provisions of the bill; but I do not think the amendments reported by the committee add anything to the efficiency of the bill.

I am not in favor of the General Government issuing a patent to the tribes as such for all the lands in these reservations. I am in favor of a distribution of the lands and patenting the lands in limited quantities to the Indians in severalty. Not being prepared to-day to either present my amendment or to give my views upon the bill, I took that course of throwing the bill over until we could have time to examine it; but I will withdraw the objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The objection is withdrawn, and the bill will be read.

The bill was read, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments.

Mr. DAWES. I have an amendment which I should like to offer. Perhaps I had better offer it now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments reported by the committee are first in order under the rule. They will be read in their order.

The first amendment was to insert, after the enacting clause and before the first section, the following section:

That in all cases where any tribes or bands of Indians have been or shall hereafter be located upon any reservation created for their use either by virtue of treaty stipulations or an act of Congress, the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause a patent to issue for each of such reservations in favor of the tribe or tribes, band or bands of Indians, occupying the same under treaty stipulations or act of Congress, which patents shall be of the legal effect and declare that the United States does and will hold the land thus patented, for the period of twenty-five years, in trust for the sole use and benefit of the tribes or bands to which it is issued, and that at the expiration of said period the United States will convey the same, by patent, in fee, discharged of said trust, and free of all charge or incumbrance whatsoever: Provided, That the President may withhold the issuance of the patent in fee in any case for such further time as he may deem to be for the interests of the Indians. And the trust created in the original patent shall be and remain in full force until the patent in fee be issued. Each of said patents shall be recorded in the General Land Office and the Indian Bureau, and shall be then placed in charge of some person designated therefor on the reservation affected thereby, for the inspection and use at all times of any one interested therein.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I suppose the numbering of the sections will be arranged.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is a clerical matter which the enrolling clerk will attend to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, in section [1] 2, line 18, after the word "of," to insert "a;" so as to make the clause read:

To each single person over 18 years of age, one-eighth of a section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section [1] 2, line 20, after the word "of," to insert "a;" so as to make the clause read:

To each orphan child under 18 years of age, one-eighth of a section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section [5] 6, line 17, after the word "void," to insert:

Provided, That these patents, when issued, shall override the patent authorized to be issued to the tribes or bands occupying reservations created by virtue of treaty stipulations or acts of Congress, and shall separate the individual allotment from the lands held in common, which proviso shall be incorporated in each of the tribal patents.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section [5] 6, after line 42, to insert:

Each of the patents aforesaid shall be recorded in the General Land Office, and afterwards delivered, free of charge, to the allottee entitled thereto.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. 8. That in cases where the use of water for irrigation is necessary to render the lands within any Indian reservation available for agricultural purposes, the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to prescribe such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary to secure a just and equal distribution thereof among the Indians residing upon any such reservations; and no other appropriation or grant of water by any riparian proprietor shall be authorized or permitted to the damage of any other riparian proprietor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section [8] 10, line 2, after the word "section," to strike out "one" and insert "two;" so as to read:

That for the purpose of making the surveys and resurveys mentioned in section 2 of this act there be, and hereby is, appropriated, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section [9] 11, line 1, after the word "act," to insert "except those relating to the issue of tribal patents;" so as to read:

That the provisions of this act, except those relating to the issue of tribal patents, shall not extend to any tribe of Indians as such until the consent of two-thirds of the male members 21 years of age shall be first had and obtained, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I have an amendment which I think is agreed to by every one, to be added on after the forty-fourth line of section 6 as the bill now is:

And if any religious society or other organization is now occupying any of the public lands to which this act is applicable for religious or educational work among the Indians, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to confirm such occupation to such society or organization by patent in quantity not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres in any one tract, so long as the same shall be so occupied, on such terms not exceeding $1.25 each acre as he shall deem just.

Mr. GORMAN. I wish the chairman of the committee would explain that.

Mr. DAWES. There are quite a number of these societies that are doing missionary work and have schools on these reservations upon lands that they have been permitted by the Interior Department to occupy. They want the privilege of buying them of the United States at a dollar and a quarter an acre, or if there are circumstances connected with the case that would lead the Secretary of the Interior to let them have them cheaper than a dollar and a quarter an acre, he may be authorized to do it so long as they occupy it for that purpose. When they cease to occupy it for missionary or educational purposes, then it goes back to the United States. That is all there is to it. The quantity can not exceed one hundred and sixty acres in any one tract, and it must be that which is now occupied for religious or educational purposes, and must be with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and at such price not exceeding a dollar and a quarter an acre as he shall think just.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask that the amendment be reported again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. It seems to me that if we are to recognize the rightfulness of the occupancy and the necessity of these religious organizations remaining where they are, we ought not to charge them anything, and if we issue them a patent after having received their money, we should never recover the title to that land. It seems to me it would be much better to simply permit by act of Congress persons already there to remain so long as their remaining will not in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior be inimical to the interests of the Indians, and let the question of the disposition of the title to the land they occupy come up when we dispose of the other titles. Now we are providing for titles to no one except for the land occupied by religious societies. The Indians themselves do not get titles by this bill.

Mr. DAWES. Certainly they do.

Mr. PLUMB. Not individual patents.

Mr. DAWES. Certainly they do.

Mr. PLUMB. Not by this act. They are to get them by some act to come hereafter.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator is mistaken about the scope of the bill.

Mr. PLUMB. Then I have misread it entirely. I do not understand that there is title in anybody by this bill.

Mr. DAWES. This permission or patent will be simply a lease during the time that these societies occupy the land for this purpose. It did not seem to anybody proper that they should take this land and then abandon it or sell it, convert it into money, and go somewhere else; but if they want to use this land for educational or religious purposes, the land they now occupy with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, it did not seem to be a very long stride to say by the act of Congress that the Secretary of the Interior should be authorized to give them a lease confirming them in that occupancy so long as they use it for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. DAWES. I am so anxious to have this bill go through that I shall withdraw my amendment if it is objected to or leads to debate.

Mr. PLUMB. I think the amendment is mischievous. I think it would lead to trouble. It is providing for a class of cases for which there is no necessity to provide.

Mr. DAWES. I withdraw the amendment, for the bill is of more consequence than the amendment, but I regret exceedingly——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts ask unanimous consent to proceed with the bill? It is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business at this hour.

Mr. DAWES. I presume the Senate will not object to finishing this bill. It is all through now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to continue the consideration of this bill. That will be considered as agreed to unless objection be made.

Mr. BLAIR. I must object unless I know precisely how much time it is likely to occupy.

Mr. DAWES. Nobody objects to anything in the bill now.

Mr. BLAIR. I have no objection, losing no rights for the educational bill, that the question shall be taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendments, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. DOLPH. I hastily prepared an amendment while the bill was being read, which I will read.

Mr. BLAIR. Before the Senator proceeds, I suppose this in no way displaces or injures the position of the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is subject to call. A single objection to the pending bill will bring up the unfinished business.

Mr. DOLPH. I shall not consume more than two minutes in stating my object in offering the amendment. I move to amend by striking out, in section 6, after the word "Congress," in line 40, the words "and the moneys agreed to be paid shall be appropriated and paid to said tribe or invested for its benefit, as the case may be." This language refers to the money to be paid to the Indian tribes for such portions of their reservations as may be purchased by the General Government. And in lieu of those words I propose to insert:

Provided, That the compensation to be paid by the United States for any portion of any such reservation shall be paid in the bonds of the United States, payable at the pleasure of the United States after twenty-five years from the date thereof, the interest payable annually to the Secretary of the Interior for the use of the Indian tribe from which the lands were purchased, to be used for the education and support of the Indian tribes and individual Indians entitled thereto.

If I may be permitted, I wish to state my reasons in a few words for offering the amendment. We are now by this bill providing for the allotment of lands in severalty to the Indians of various tribes upon their reservations, and authorizing the purchase of the lands not used for that purpose from the Indians by the Secretary of the Interior for a money consideration. What I fear is that if the bill becomes a law, and the residue of the reservations after making the allotments to individual Indians is paid for in money, that the money will be used, and that the lands allotted to the Indians, being alienable after twenty-five years, will be sold, and eventually we will find that we shall have all the Indians of the country upon our hands, and we will be compelled to support them by annual appropriations from the Treasury of the United States.

I should like to provide that in the purchase of the residue of the reservations we shall not pay over the money; that we shall pay the Indians a fair consideration for their right to the occupancy of the lands, and place that in bonds of the United States payable to the Secretary of the Treasury for the time being for the benefit of the Indians, and thus provide a continuing fund to be derived from the interest of the bonds for the support and education of those people, and leave it optional with the United States when the principal of the bonds shall be paid. Then the Government can put the lands purchased from the Indians upon sale and may derive a profit from the lands, and at the same time, as I say, provide a continuing fund for the suport of the Indians. Otherwise, if that is not done, if some security is not taken for the preservation of the fund which is to be derived from the sale of the residue of the reservations, I think the time may come when the Indians will become paupers on our hands, to be supported by annual appropriations from the Treasury of money derived from taxation.

I think there can be no objection to the amendment.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator be kind enough to state where the amendment comes in?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment.

Mr. DAWES. The purpose for which the Senator proposes his amendment is a commendable one. I will state the objection, if any, that lies to it, abating the form. If it is to be placed in the Treasury as a fund, the ordinary form of such funds is somewhat different from that which the Senator suggests; but that is mere form.

The Senator will observe that the language of the bill leaves it at the discretion of the Department when the occasion arises either to invest the money, as the Senator suggests, or to pay in part the principal for any such then existing exigency in reference to any particular tribe as will be upon him then. It seems to me that the provision of the Senator's amendment to bind the Secretary at the end of twenty-five years from to-day to that particular course which seems to us to-day to be wise is to ignore all the vicissitudes and changes and relations of the Government to the Indian, the Indian to the Government, and the condition of the Indian then, and is putting it beyond the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior. I see no other objection to it. As at present advised, in the present state of the country and of the Indian, I am heartily with the Senator's amendment.

I am not one of those who believe that it is of any mortal use to an Indian to pay over to him per capita money. It is worse than throwing it into the sea. It not only is throwing away the money, but is debauching and ruining the Indian. But what may be the condition of the Indian twenty-five years from now, whether a portion of the principal may not be more wisely between now and then expended in agricultural implements, in teaching him agriculture or in teaching him any of the self-sustaining modes of life, is a question which I do not think we ought to so tie up this money that we can not ourselves consider. That is all the objection I see to the Senator's amendment.

It was thought by the committee that if we left in the words proposed to be stricken out there would be the power on the part of the Department to invest the money, and also, if in any particular case a part of the principal should be disposed of for the immediate benefit of the Indians, he would still have that power.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask unanimous consent to reply.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon asks the consent of the Senate to reply. Under the rule it is the duty of the Chair to confine him to one speech, but with the unanimous consent of the Senate the Senator will proceed.

Mr. DOLPH. I asked unanimous consent. I know I am not entitled to the floor under the rule.

I am not willing to leave it to the Secretary of the Interior to say whether twenty-five years from now we shall have 250,000 paupers in this nation to be fed, clothed, and educated out of the public Treasury, when there is now an ample fund which by a little foresight can be placed in such a situation that the Government can have that fund for all time on hand for that purpose. I think it would be far better for Congress to retain the right to say whether the principal of this money should be paid over, and thus preserve this fund for the support and education of the Indians, than it would be to leave it to the Secretary of the Interior to determine whether or not an investment should be made for the benefit of the Indian sor the money paid over to them.

That is the reason why I have offered the amendment. The bill can go over until to-morrow morning if Senators prefer.

Mr. DAWES. If the bill would occupy the same place to-morrow morning that it does now I think it would be better for the Senator to mature his amendment and let it go over.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It will occupy the same place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will stand at the head of the Calendar to-morrow.

Mr. CONGER. Before the bill goes over I wish to call the attention of the committee to one point to be considered before to-morrow morning. There is nothing said in the bill in regard to the taxation of this property. This alienable property of the Indians is distributed in all States and Territories where the lands lie, and there is an uncertainty in regard to the right of the State or Territory to tax the property. I think some provision of that kind is worthy of the consideration of the committee.

Mr. DAWES. The bill protects the property of the Indians for twenty-five years. That is the limit. That is the intent of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. It does not say so in terms.

Mr. DAWES. It says so in absolute legal effect, because the United States is to hold the title. The title in fee remains in the United States for twenty-five years.

Mr. CONGER. But it is not to be inalienable for twenty-five years. I merely call attention to it. It seems to me there should be some provision by which this property could all be saved to the Indians and saved to them from any attempt at taxation.

Mr. COKE. Let the bill go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill goes over until to-morrow. It will stand at the head of the Calendar to-morrow morning.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 4689) for the relief of Eliza W. Patterson was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 22d instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 196) for the relief of the devisees of the late Daniel Carroll; and

An act (S. 1314) to change the name of the James Sweet National Bank of Nebraska City, Nebr.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 12, and 13 to the bill (H. R. 6073) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, and for other purposes; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and has appointed Mr. SAMUEL J. RANDALL of Pennsylvania, Mr. J. N. BURNES of Missouri, and Mr. WILLIAM H. CALKINS of Indiana, managers at the conference on its part.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 4993) making it a felony for a person to falsely and fraudulently assume or pretend to be an officer or employé acting under authority of the United States or any Department thereof, and prescribing a penalty therefor; and

A bill (H. R. 6021) to authorize the National Bank of Middletown, Pa., to change its location and name.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business will now be proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. HARRISON to the amendment offered by Mr. PLUMB.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senate ready for the question on the pending amendment?

Mr. BLAIR. Before the question is put I wish to make a few statements showing the effect of the amendment upon the bill. I suppose perhaps the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] may have something to say upon his amendment, and if no other Senator cares to speak at this time I will make a few statements. The effect of the amendment will be to diminish the amount of money which otherwise would be distributed in the Southern States alone for the first year in the sum of $3,654,848.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator repeat that statement?

Mr. BLAIR. The effect will be to diminish the amount distributed in the States of Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, Missouri, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia, and West Virginia in the aggregate of $3,654,848, unless in a hasty addition I have made a miscalculation.

I will state to the Senate the effect of this amendment upon the several States enumerated seriatim. Alabama, as the bill now stands, would receive $1,044,607. In the year 1881, the last year for which we have authentic and tabulated returns of an official character, to wit, the returns of the Bureau of Education, in that State there was expended the sum of $410,690. The State of Alabama, then, would lose by the adoption of this amendment $633,917 the first year. The State of Arkansas under the provisions of the bill would receive $486,856. In the year 1881 she expended $388,412, and by this amendment she would lose $98,444. Florida by the bill would receive $193,241. In 1881 she expended $114,895, and she would lose by the amendment of the Senator from Indiana $83,046. The State of Georgia would receive under the provisions of the bill $1,254,202. She raised in the year 1881 $498,533, practically $500,000, and she would lose by the adoption of this amendment $755,669. The State of Kentucky under the operation of the bill would receive $839,624. In that State the expenditure is already larger than the apportionment, and therefore the State would not be affected by the adoption of the amendment. The State of Louisiana would receive by the bill $767,295. In 1881 she raised $441,484. She would therefore lose $325,811. Maryland would receive under the bill $324,116. She has already raised a larger amount, and would not be affected by the adoption of the amendment. Mississippi would receive $899,414 by the bill. She expended in 1881 $757,758, and she would lose by the operation of this amendment $141,656. Missouri would receive under the bill $503,097. She already expends over $3,000,000, and therefore would lose nothing by the adoption of the amendment. North Carolina would receive under the bill $1,118,179. In 1881 she raised $409,659. She would lose by the amendment $708,520. South Carolina under the bill would receive $892,333. She raised $345,634, and she would lose $546,699. Tennessee would receive under the bill $989,840. She expended in 1881 $638,009, and she would lose by the amendment $351,831. Texas, with 2,000,000 inhabitants, a population just about the same as Indiana (Indiana spending some four or five million dollars annually), would receive under the bill $762,601. She expended in 1881 $753,346, and would consequently lose by the amendment $9,255. Virginia would receive under the bill $1,037,148. As she now expends that amount she would not be affected by the adoption of the amendment; neither would West Virginia be affected by the adoption of the amendment. West Virginia would receive under the bill $205,756, and she already expends $761,250. It will be observed that the bill affects ten of the Southern States, nearly all of them, very seriously. If there is reason for passing the bill at all, there is reason in these States where there is most illiteracy and least money already expended that we should give most largely.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER, of California. The Senator has stated what certain States would "lose" by the amendment. I suppose he means that there would be that much less money appropriated from the Treasury, does he not?

Mr. BLAIR. I mean that under the apportionment provided in the bill the States would receive a certain amount. The Senator from Indiana proposes that they shall receive from the Treasury the amount which they themselves expend. Taking, then, the amount that they expended at the time when we had the last authentic returns, the difference between what would be given to those States under the amendment and the amount that they take under the bill is what I state as the amount that they would lose by the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. MILLER, of California. The amounts stated as losses do not go to other States?

Mr. BLAIR. No; they do not go to other States.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Then instead of appropriating $15,000,000, the amendment proposes to appropriate several million dollars less?

Mr. BLAIR. That would be a matter to be adjusted in some way.

Mr. MILLER, of California. That would be the effect of the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. If that was to be done, it would seem to me it would be only just to those States that provision should be made by which, if at any time during the operation of the act they should by additional expenditure make up for the deficiencies of the earlier years, they should be allowed to draw from the Treasury the amount to which they would be entitled, so as to be placed in the end upon the same ground as other States. If the amendment should be adopted I hope that something of that kind may yet be done; but it seems to me that it is better to do nothing of the sort, as regards the adoption of the amendment itself.

As I was about to say, there is not one of those States where there is not a public-school system in operation, and, like a mill, it runs as long as there is motive power, which is the money to pay the teachers and the ordinary school-district expenses. The difficulty now is that there is only money enough to keep the schools in operation about three months, some of them shorter and some of them longer, but in all the Southern States in fact there is only an average of three months per annum. If we simply provide for additional pay for the teachers and the ordinary running expenses of the schools we shall easily use up, without any chance for irrelevant or unprofitable expenditure, more than the entire amount which we undertake to give by the bill in its broadest, largest terms.

It should be considered further with reference to the amount that actually would be taken from the States, that the amount which is given here as that expended in the several States includes the expenditure for school-houses also, and the expenditure for school-houses in the Southern States is very large, and must necessarily continue so in the future. The amendment only gives them whatever they may expend upon running expenses, not including that for school-houses. If the school system is to increase, if there is to be provision or accommodation for something like three million unenrolled and therefore entirely unaccommodated scholars in the South, there must be a great many more school-houses constructed, and that is a burden which, by the provisions of the bill, devolves entirely upon the States themselves. Therefore, the data which I give, the only reliable data that I know of coming down to the present time or anywhere near it, are by no means a strong but rather a weak, statement of the injurious effect of the adoption of the amendment upon the measure itself and upon the cause which we are undertaking to assist by this sort of legislation if we should adopt it. Of course, I have not any means of showing how much of this expenditure in the year 1881 was for school-houses, but it is a pretty large proportion in many of the States.

I trust that the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I did not intend to be led into any discussion of the general features of this bill, but it is proper that I should evince my own sincerity in proposing this amendment by some brief defense of it.

The Senator from New Hampshire who has the bill in charge seems to be very jealous of any attempt to modify any of its features as reported by the committee of which he is chairman. He regards the amendment which I have proposed as injurious, and he has been at pains to show the representatives of the Southern States just how much each one of their States will lose if the amendment is adopted. His appeal is to the self-interest of the representatives of those States.

It is an open question whether we shall do an injury to this scheme of education by curtailing its proportions. In my judgment we shall be doing a real benefit. I very well understood when I proposed the amendment that it would curtail the amounts to be given to the several States. And my intention is, if the amendment shall be adopted, to propose an amendment to the first section of the bill, which fixes the amounts to be paid out each year for ten years. The Senator from New Hampshire has shown us that nearly $4,000,000 less would be necessary the first year if my amendment is adopted.

Mr. President, there is a giving that pauperizes; there is a giving that enfeebles. It is against that sort of giving that I protest. The wisest managers of benevolence in these latter years have come to the conclusion that giving should always be so regulated as to save self-respect and awaken in the mind of the recipient a lost faith in his ability to take care of himself. We should carefully avoid that giving which creates a disposition to lean and to expect; which takes the stamina and strength and self-dependence and industry out of men.

That principle will, I think, apply to the giving which is proposed by this bill. Is it not sufficiently liberal to say to those States where education has been lagging, where illiteracy is prevalent, "We will give one dollar from the national Treasury for every dollar that you raise by State taxation to be expended in the maintenance of your schools?" Must we give two for one? Is the giving of two for one, as this bill proposes, as well calculated to stimulate the energies of those States as the proposition I make? I insist that it is not.

The only permanent reliance for the education of the masses must be upon local taxation in the States; every one concedes that. The distinguished Senator who has charge of this bill has found it necessary to write in one of his sections a disclaimer of any different intention. If it be true, then, that we are not to maintain education in the States; if it be true that we are to discharge our obligations toward the freedmen of the South in this indirect way, which does not reach them as a separate class, but includes them with the general citizenship of the country; and if we are to do this through the agencies of the States, and must depend upon the State interest in the common schools for any permanent success, I submit that we ought to make these appropriations so that they will stimulate, energize, and encourage—not pauperize—the efforts of those States in the direction of a thorough popular education.

One dollar voted by the people of any school district for the support of common schools is worth $10 given out of the Treasury of the United States. It evinces an interest in education, and guarantees a careful and intelligent supervision. Only a local supervision and interest will bring these constituencies that are now so backward in the race of education abreast with the other States. In my judgment there could be no worse policy than to throw in a single year into those States $15,000,000 out of the national Treasury. In many of the Southern States there is no suitable provision for the use of it.

Mr. BLAIR. Only $10,000,000 are given to the Southern States.

Mr. HARRISON. I know, but I am speaking of the whole appropriation. As was stated the other day by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], three-quarters of a million or more would be thrown the first year into the State of Louisiana, when the total collection for school purposes in that State is only some $400,000. What is to be done with this money? It is like taking a manufacturing enterprise that has had $5,000 invested in its plant and suddenly increasing its capital to $100,000.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Is he aware that the facilities for education are not all they might be in that region of the country, and that according to a very well-authenticated report there are 2,000,000 children without opportunities for educational advantages there who might be supplied possibly by this aid?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know to what section of the country the Senator refers.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. You are speaking of the South.

Mr. HARRISON. I am, but there must first be school-houses either temporary or permanent. In the next place there must be competent teachers secured, and back of all that there must be some system of law for these schools. Much of this is still lacking, or sadly deficient, in many of the States.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator will excuse me——

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not understand that he is correct in saying that there is a deficiency in the system of laws. Every one of those States has a good common-school system organized and applied, geographically applied, so far as the means enable them to do it; but as the Senator from Florida says, there are not only 2,000,000 but 3,000,000 children in the Southern States as yet without any school accommodations whatever.

Mr. HARRISON. I have not examined the school laws of all the States of the South, but if the machinery is perfect, as the Senator from New Hampshire seems to think—though I do not coincide—it is but one element of those I suggested as essential to the proper use of this money. There are others yet to be supplied; so that the Senator from Iowa was clearly right when he said that the logical method was to increase the appropriation from year to year rather than to begin with the largest appropriation.

I am thoroughly in sympathy with the proposition that the General Government shall, out of the general revenue, extend its hand to aid the States that are not able to inaugurate and perfect a school system that will give an opportunity to all the children, black and white, to acquire the elements of education. But I believe that we are entering here upon an experiment, and that our legislation should be tentative; framed as for an experiment. I am in favor of saying to the States, "We will measure the help we give you by what you do for yourselves; we will increase the help as you increasingly help yourselves." These schools must rest, as I have said, if they are to have permanent success, upon the interest, the self-sacrificing interest, of the local communities.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator from Indiana a question?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. If his amendment prevails will it not be necessary to reduce the amount of $15,000,000 provided for in the bill?

Mr. HARRISON. I had already indicated in the beginning of my remarks a purpose to move an amendment reducing the amount; and I may say that I would reduce the number of years through which the appropriation is to run. It is an experiment, and I should continue it or abandon it as I found that its effect in the States for which it is specially intended was to stimulate them to increase their own local school taxes or the reverse. And I should abandon the experiment at once and forever if I found that there was not an equal free-handed distribution of the State and national revenues, without distinction of race or color, among all its illiterate population.

I believe the success of the bill in the Senate will be imperiled and is imperiled to-day by the fact that the framers of the bill have enlarged its proportions too much. Instead of dealing with this subject experimentally they have undertaken to deal with it permanently, to exhaust the whole subject. Therefore I think that my amendment is calculated to save the bill.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to interrupt the Senator for a minute.

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to state to the Senator from Indiana that the rule he insists on as just and proper—that the States should raise as much money as is donated by the Federal Government—can not be complied with in some of the States. I want to call his attention to the fact that in Mississippi there are about 175,000 more colored people than there are white people. I want to state to him also the fact that those colored people, not by any fault of their own, but from their condition and the tax laws of Mississippi, pay very little of this tax. They own but little property, and by the laws of Mississippi nearly all they do own is exempt from taxation. I made out a list this morning, and I wish to read it to the Senate. It is very short. Will the Senator allow me to do so?

Mr. HARRISON. Would not the Senator just as soon wait until I get through and then make his speech and have this table embodied in his remarks instead of mine?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not want to trespass upon the good nature of the Senator, but I wanted to get this statement in the RECORD.

Mr. HARRISON. I am scarcely willing, I will say to the Senator, to have his speech made while I have the floor, but I shall be through in a few moments and he will then have an opportunity to make his statement.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not want to abuse the courtesy of the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. The point the Senator makes I can readily respond to without his giving any further details.

Mr. GEORGE. Then let me make the statement emphatically that there is a burden thrown upon the white people of Mississippi, who are not rich, not only of educating their own children but all the children of the colored people, who number 175,000 more than the whites, and that owing to the condition of the blacks and owing to the liberal tax laws of Mississippi exempting their property from taxation they pay very little of this burden, and therefore it would be impossible for the State to raise as much money as would be necessary efficiently to educate all those people.

Mr. HARRISON. I have no doubt that the general statement which the Senator from Mississippi has made, namely, that the colored population of his State exceeds the white population by about 175,000, is true, though the election returns would seem to throw some doubt upon the statement. No doubt the census returns are more accurate than the election returns. But, Mr. President, the ultimate obligation of educating those black people as well as the illiterate whites is upon the State of Mississippi. While her black people may not have accumulated in the few years that have intervened since they were manumitted any great amount of property upon which the tax-gatherer can place his hands, yet they are to-day by their labor contributing to the wealth and prosperity of Mississippi I suppose fully in the proportion that their numbers bear to the white population. The exemption from taxation to which the Senator has referred I suppose is not a legislative discrimination in favor of the black man, but that the same exemption applies to the poor white people of his State.

Mr. GEORGE. That is true.

Mr. HARRISON. Then we have nothing in the statistics furnished by the Senator from Mississippi that should change the basis of this appropriation. If that State is weak and incapable now to deal with this question of education, we shall only make it more incapable, permanently incapable, if we take from its shoulders the burden and obligation to educate its own people. We can help them; I would help them, and just as this help stimulates the people whom the Senator represents here to increase their own burdens in the eager, earnest desire that illiteracy and ignorance may be put away from the State and that virtue and intelligence may come in in their places, just in proportion as the State feels an interest in these things and girds itself to the work, the Government should come in with its helping hand. Nothing worse could happen to the Senator's State than that we should now pass a bill that would put upon the General Government the entire burden of educating the people of his State.

Mr. GEORGE. We do not ask it.

Mr. HARRISON. I know the Senator does not ask it. I say nothing worse could happen. It would make it absolutely certain that the time when his people would take upon their own shoulders the taxes necessary to maintain an efficient and thorough system of education would be indefinitely postponed. The result of our giving two dollars for every one the State gives would be less disastrous, but the tendency is the same.

Mr. President, when we give an amount equal to that collected by the State we are dealing very liberally, and we are so administering the beneficence of the General Government that we shall have a benefit altogether above that direct benefit which will come in the instruction of a few more children in these years while this appropriation is being used, for we shall stimulate an interest in education which shall continue when our benefactions cease, and which shall go on until there shall not be found an American child willing to receive an education who has not the opportunity of acquiring it.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] remarked the other day that those educators who had been interested in the framing of this bill were not aware of the needs of the South on the subject of education. He intimated that the negro race had to be differently dealt with; that some different kind of education or some different appliances and methods of education were required in the case of the negro race. I am not familiar with the present condition of the colored people in any of the States except my own, but I have more than once in the course of my life had opportunity to notice the hunger of the black man for education. Some of the most pathetic sights I have ever witnessed in my life I saw when the advancing armies of the Union were brought in contact with the slave population of the South. Aged colored men, slaves from their mother's womb, came into our camps as into cities of refuge. I have seen old men past the meridian of life, yes, well on toward its end, after a hard day's work in the company's kitchen, lying prone upon the ground before the camp fire with spelling-books in their hands painfully trying to fasten in their memories the names and outlines of the letters of the alphabet. Every philanthropist must sympathize with the blind thus groping toward the light.

My only concern is that we shall give here wisely, give by wise methods, give upon a basis that instead of enervating and pauperizing will stimulate the efforts of the Southern States. We may then enter, North and South, upon a generous rivalry as to which State shall show the smallest percentage of illiteracy, as to which State shall have a citizenship best instructed in those things that constitute the only safe basis of republican government.

I would help; I would encourage. I have not a single word of bitterness to speak to-day toward any Southern State; but I do believe that we shall best help, as a Senator from one of those States remarked to me privately the other day, if instead of stepping in with such large benefactions as to repress the efforts of the States themselves we so give as that we shall encourage the noble impulse which has manifested itself in some of those States to wipe out this reproach under which they have lived so long.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I have no reply to make to the allusions of the Senator from Indiana to what he was pleased to call the difference between the election statistics and the census statistics of Mississippi. What I have to say upon this subject I shall endeavor to say in a non-sectional spirit. I had thought that the education of the colored people of the South was too high, too noble, too pressing to be made the subject-matter of party or sectional dispute.

I want to say a word or two only in support of the bill, and I want the gentlemen on both sides of this Chamber to understand that I do not come here on behalf of the people of Mississippi as a beggar or supplicant for favors from the national Treasury.

I know the colored people of Mississippi, who are anxious, as the Senator from Indiana says, to be educated, desire to have the means of advancing themselves in life, desire to elevate themselves and their children. I know they do feel a deep interest in this measure. I feel it my duty to present their case to the Senate of the United States, and I desire to do it without hurting anybody's feelings, without exciting any sectional passion or bitter animosity or any unpleasant recollections.

The colored people are there in Mississippi; they are there ignorant; they are there without the means on the part of the people of Mississippi to educate them as they ought to be educated. We are doing everything in our power to educate them; we are paying the most onerous taxes; and yet, as I said to the Senator from Indiana a few moments ago, owing to the fact that these people were poor without their fault, and owing to the liberality of our Legislature in exempting property of poor people, white and black, from taxation, that the necessary taxation for State government, for county and municipal government, and for educational purposes had reached a figure in Mississippi that made the tax-payer look with horror to the day when the tax-collector came around.

Mr. President, the question is not how much we ought to do. We are doing all we can. If we raise the taxes in Mississippi much higher than they are now it means confiscation.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him what the average percentage of tax is upon the hundred dollars in Mississippi?

Mr. GEORGE. From $1.50 to $2.50 on the hundred.

Mr. HARRISON. I speak of the average through the State.

Mr. GEORGE. It is from a dollar and a half to two dollars and a half.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator think the average is as much as $1.50 on the hundred dollars throughout the State?

Mr. GEORGE. I think that is the lowest.

Mr. HARRISON. Then the Senator can not state what the average is?

Mr. GEORGE. There is on the statute-book of Mississippi——

Mr. BLAIR. I can state it from table 18. The average in Mississippi is 2.15 cents on the dollar, or $2.15 on every hundred dollars in the State of Mississippi now for all purposes, and it is the highest of any Southern State save Louisiana, in which it is $2.74. In the entire South the average is $1.58. In New England it is $1.58; in the Middle States, $1.82; in the Western States, $2.08. So that Mississippi is higher than the average of the Western States, because Mississippi is $2.15, and the Western States are $2.08. In the Territories the average is $2.06. The average throughout the United States is $1.85 on the hundred dollars.

Mr. FRYE. But what information does that convey unless the valuation is given? You will find that the valuation of real estate in Mississippi and those Southern States is not anywhere near the valuation in the Northern States.

Mr. BLAIR. You will find, alluding to the State of Kansas, which was spoken of here the other day, that the State of Kansas is a much poorer State per capita than Nebraska. It is one of the very poorest States in the whole country per capita except the Southern States, which average $155, while Kansas is about $160. I inquired of an ex-Senator from Kansas how he could account for this, and he informed me that the valuation of real estate was greatly underestimated; that there could be no other way of accounting for it, for Kansas is really, as we all know, and as her Senators have explained to us, one of the wealthiest and most progressive and most rapidly producing States of the Union.

The trouble with the Southern States in this matter of taxation is that they have just barely enough to live upon at the best, and taxation must come from the surplus beyond the necessities of life and from the activity of the producing forces. In the South, setting aside three States, Texas, North Carolina, and Georgia, between 1870 and 1880—and the abolition of slavery does not touch that valuation—they lost by the valuation of the census $411,000,000. The average per capita throughout the United States is over $350, if I recollect. That of the Southern States, including the negroes and all, is only $155. The producing activity or force of the section is very small indeed compared with the Western States, where money is made faster than anywhere else, and there is more of a surplus, something to pay taxes out of; and then the colored population, as has been stated before, does not average over $5 per capita of taxable property in value.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Senator state to the Senate what his judgment is as to the reason of that condition of things in favor of the Western States?

Mr. BLAIR. I can state those reasons if I am not trespassing on the time of the Senator from Mississippi. I have gone throughout upon the theory that it is of vastly less consequence what reasons led to the existing condition of things than it is to ascertain what that condition is and to remedy it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi will resume the floor.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the question asked by the Senator from Maine——

Mr. BLAIR. I do not want to interrupt the Senator again; but I wish him to be in possession of this fact, that after this distribution on the basis of $15,000,000 is made his State will have only about $4 to educate each child of school age of its school population, but Massachusetts will have almost $20. So the Southern child, as compared with the Massachusetts child, gets only one-fifth of the help to education which the Northern child has.

Mr. GEORGE. In reply to the question asked by the Senator from Maine of the Senator from New Hampshire about the valuation, I desire to say that I do not believe the assessed valuation of the lands in Mississippi could be procured for them if they were offered for cash in the market. I am very sure, so far as my knowledge goes of assessments of real estate in Mississippi, that the lands could not be sold for cash for the amount of the assessment. I desire also to state that in Mississippi taxation is universal: it applies to all kinds of property. It applies to choses in action, to credits, to money, everything, in fact, that can be made an article of property, with the exception to which I shall call the attention of the Senate now.

Mr. HOAR. May I inquire of the Senator for information what is the poll-tax in Mississippi, if there is one?

Mr. GEORGE. The constitution of Mississippi authorized the levy of a poll-tax not exceeding $2, to be applied to common schools. It was levied at that sum for several years; but it was rarely ever paid, or at least very little of it was paid. I think now it is about a dollar; all of it, by the constitution, going to school purposes. It can not be applied to anything else.

Now I want to show the exceptions in Mississippi to taxation, exceptions based mainly upon the idea of relieving the colored people and white people with little property from the burdens of taxation. The wearing apparel of every person is exempt from taxation; the provisions on hand necessary for the family; all farming products while in the hands of the producer; one gun for private use; all poultry; household furniture not exceeding $250, which covers all the household furniture that is owned by the freedmen or very nearly every one; two cows and calves; ten head of sheep; farming utensils for agricultural purposes; and the tools of a mechanic necessary for his trade.

I want to say, Mr. President, that I should like to have the colored people of Mississippi educated far beyond what they are likely to be, even if this bill passes. They desire to be educated. I want the white people of Mississippi educated. I believe that sentiment pervades the bosoms of nine-tenths of the white people of Mississippi. We have made great efforts in that direction; we have done all that was in our power.

I desire now to say that while I shall be disappointed if this bill fails to pass, yet I can blame no one, and will blame no one. The North controls the Government; it controls the Treasury; it is rich and it is powerful. If it does not desire to give this aid to the Southern people to help them educate a class who can do but little toward helping to educate themselves, if it is unwilling to do this, I submit and make no complaint. But, Mr. President, I would say this one word more, that the condition of the colored people of the South with respect to education ought to appeal with some force to Senators on both sides of this Chamber. It is a very serious question what is to be the future relation between those people and the whites. We can not foresee what it is going to be entirely. I hope that much good in that respect will come from educating both, and it is therefore that I shall vote for the bill.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, I wish in a few words to give the reasons why I can not concur with a number of my friends from the South in supporting this bill.

The theory of appropriating a certain portion of the public domain for common-school purposes was at a very early period in the history of our Government adopted. The ordinance for the government of the Northwest Territory was adopted on the 13th of July, 1787, by the Congress of the Confederation. At that time the convention which framed the Constitution was in session. During the first session, I believe, of Congress after the Constitution went into operation provision was made for assigning the sixteenth section in every township for school purposes. That same policy was kept up when the Territory of Orleans was acquired by the treaty between Mr. Jefferson and Napoleon Bonaparte in 1803, not only for common-school purposes, but provision was made there also for the establishment of universities. The same policy was applied, I believe, when Florida was acquired, and certainly after the great Mexican acquisition under the treaty of 1848 came in. Subsequently two sections were assigned for school purposes, the sixteenth and thirty-sixth.

Up to that point the theory of appropriating public domain for school purposes was controlled by the clause of the Constitution that "Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States." After that a certain percentage out of the sales of public lands lying within the jurisdiction of several of the States was donated to the States, respectively, within which such lands were situate. That was a departure from the original theory, which was the appropriation of the land itself.

I believe that the object which the United States had in view in appropriating land for school purposes was, first, to aid the schools, and second, that the donation of this land for school purposes would appreciate in value all the lands belonging to the United States within the neighborhood of the schools thus established, and that practically the United States Government would get back in the appreciation of its lands whatever might be the value of the land assigned to school purposes. I suppose that was the theory. There was, however, a departure when a part of the money itself was given to the State of Illinois, to the State of Missouri, and various other States, ranging from 2 to 5 per cent. of the net proceeds of the lands lying in the States respectively.

It would be difficult to draw a distinction, at all events it is with me, between the appropriation of money arising from the proceeds of the sales of public lands and any other money that goes into the Treasury; but all this has been settled for so many years, about ninety years, and has been passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States over and over again. The land which was donated for school purposes has long ago passed into private hands and has become private property, and the law has become a rule of property, and it is too late now in my judgment to be raising any question on that ground.

It is therefore simply a question of expediency with me so far as the passage of this bill is concerned, and I have various reasons why I think it would be inexpedient.

First, I believe that the schools, as well as all other local and domestic institutions within the boundaries of a State, are better managed, conducted, and controlled by the State governments than they can be by the United States Government. That is my judgment, and every State adapts itself, in so far as the taxation for school purposes is concerned, to the ability of the State to sustain the school system.

Now, if you make this very large appropriation, amounting in the aggregate to $105,000,000 in ten years, beginning with $15,000,000 the first year, then $14,000,000 the second year, and so on going down, you give to the State a certain artificial stimulus by this appropriation made by the United States, and on that stimulus of this amount of money added to the money which is raised by the State you cause the State to adopt a system more extensive, requiring more money than the ability of the State without such aid is able to keep up, and when this money thus raised by this bill ceases to flow into the school fund of the State, you have an expensive system, requiring a large amount of money, without means to uphold that system. It is the figure of De Solme, the ship helpless because the supply of water, the floating power, has receded. It is a school system of great proportions helpless because the supply has been withdrawn.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him a moment there?

Mr. MAXEY. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] a few moments ago endeavored to illustrate to the Senate that it was absolutely out of the taxing power of the State of Mississippi to furnish schools to its people. Now I ask the Senator from Texas, if in such a case it is not proper for the United States Government, rich and strong, to help them, what must be the result? Only the ignorance of that population. What remedy does the Senator from Texas propose in such a case.

Mr. MAXEY. If the Senator from Iowa will wait a moment I think I can tell him. I think we occupy here two relations. The Constitution of the United States evidently contemplates that each State shall be represented by its own Senators from the fact that it apportions to each of the States two Senators. We then specially represent our States. As a Senate, as a body, we legislate, so far as our action goes in legislation, for the whole United States. Now, I do not propose to go inside the State of Mississippi and any other State to tell what they can or can not do there. I can only tell what we can do in the State which I have the honor in part to represent; and in casting my vote on this proposition, I beg to say that I vote what I believe to be for the best interest of the State of Texas.

Undoubtedly the Senator from Mississippi believes his State can not maintain as efficient schools as he would like. But in the end I believe that that Senator will find that he has underrated the ability of his State in this respect, and I think in time he will conclude that Mississippi had better rely on her own resources.

Now I will take up the line of argument I was on when the question was asked.

As I have said, if you inflate the school system in a State by this artificial aid which lasts but a short time—for ten years is but a short time in the life of a State—you establish in that State an expensive system beyond the means of the State, and when the artificial stimulant is drawn away, your State capacity is not sufficient to keep up the system. That is one objection I have to the bill, and a serious one as I think.

Again, as I stated before, I believe that all local and domestic institutions should be under the control and direction of the State. Whenever the States come to the conclusion that they must not depend on themselves, but that they must go to the Federal Government as a great parent and rely upon that and lean upon that, it takes from the State that independence, that manhood, that self-reliance which ought to enable the State to uphold and maintain its own institutions. That is another ground which I have, and a very important one in my judgment.

Now, let me speak of what we are doing in Texas. Much has been said in respect to the education of the colored people of the South. We have a great many in Texas, and yet the constitution under which we live commands that the school fund of that State shall be ratably distributed share and share alike to the colored and the white. We have three normal schools in the State. One of those normal schools—and they are all supported by the State—is for the education of colored teachers. We have an agricultural and mechanical college, and a branch of that is devoted exclusively to the education of colored people. We have a common-school system extending throughout the whole State of Texas, and the colored people have their share of school-money for the education of their people the same as we have. The schools are separate, and they ought to be separate, but as to the amount which they receive, it is their share according to their number within the scholastic age, the same as for the white children.

Now, as to the ability of Texas to support a school system. We have about 30,000,000 acres of land belonging to the common-school fund. We have about three and a half million dollars in the permanent school fund already, and it is every year increasing. We expended last year about $1,100,000 for school purposes without expending a dollar of the permanent fund. Next year we shall expend much more than that, and why? Because we have recently most wisely adopted an amendment to our constitution which enables us to do it. And what was that? Under the constitution of 1875 not exceeding one-fourth of the general revenues must be expended for school purposes. The effect of that was that in order to reach as high up in the way of taxation for school purposes as we thought necessary we had for the other three-fourths of revenue devoted to general purposes raised too much, and the result was that we had about $3,000,000 in the treasury over and above what was needed for the general expenditures of the State. I say that resulted from the fact that we could not go beyond one-fourth for common schools; and 50 cents on the $100 being the limit of our State taxation, in order to get 12½ cents on the $100 for school purposes we had to levy 50 cents for general revenues, and that left 37½ cents on every $100 taxed for general purposes, which was more than we needed.

Now, by the amendment to the constitution the Legislature assesses what may be considered right for school purposes and then what may be considered right for general purposes, and in this way the school tax is not limited to one-fourth the general revenues. The two taxes are thus dissociated, each laid for its own object, without reference to the other.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Permit me to ask a question.

Mr. MAXEY. I should like to finish this point and then I will yield.

So now, by the constitution as it now is, the people by their Legislature can levy just as much as they please for school purposes, and the first thing the Legislature did was to increase the school tax to 15 cents on the $100—two and a half cents beyond what we had the power to lay under the constitution as it was. In addition to that great source we have recently adopted the policy of leasing our school grass lands at so much per acre. I believe the land board fixed it at not less than 8 cents per acre. From that will result a large amount of revenue from the leases for grazing purposes of these grass lands. All that goes into the school fund; and with these various resources I could not with justice and sincerity say to the Senate that Texas is not able to educate her own children, white and black. I will now be glad to hear the Senator's question.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. What I desired to ask the Senator is this: If his State was not in some sort of an exceptional condition from that of other Southern States inasmuch as on her admission to the Union she had entire control and entire property rights over the public domain of that State which no other State of the Union enjoyed?

Mr. MAXEY. Undoubtedly. I am dealing with the State of Texas, and one of the wisest and most judicious things the State of Texas ever did was to retain that which she had won by her own strong arm. That was statesmanship, sagacity. Not one acre of land in the State of Texas was ever acquired by the blood and treasure of the United States; it was won by the strong arm of Texas herself; and when she came into this Union she retained that which she of right had acquired, owned, and possessed in her own right. It was a wise thing; and out of that we have built up this splendid common-school system; and let me say more, not only have we built up this common-school system, but over and above that we have laid the foundation of the grandest university within the limits of the American Union.

We appropriated in the old congress of the republic 217,000 acres of land, which is now in the very center and heart of the best part of Texas, worth from $5 to $15 an acre; in addition to that the Legislature not long since appropriated 1,000,000 more acres of land for the university. We have established that university with a corps of professors which will compare favorably with those of any university in this Union, and it is going onward and upward, and the end will be that we shall have the most munificent endowment of any university, and a university equal in all regards to Oxford or Cambridge or to any university on this continent or Europe. And let me further say that the annual expenses are drawn from the net annual gains of the permanent fund, without at all drawing on the principal of the permanent fund, and that tuition is free as God's free air to rich and poor alike.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I want the Senator to understand that I do not complain of the fortunate position of Texas. I rejoice that she has been able to accomplish all this. I only wanted to know if it was not the fact that she was in a more favorable position to build up her school system than the rest of her Southern sisters.

Mr. MAXEY. In reply to that I do not pretend to say that all the States of the South are so well off as Texas; but I said to the Senator from Iowa, and I repeat to the Senator from Florida, that in this particular regard I spoke only for my own people.

Mr. President, I have stated something of the resources of the State of Texas. I have other reasons which influence me outside of the ability of Texas. They may not be very good. They have controlled me all my life in my own private affairs; they do as a public man. I heard the Senator from Connecticut sitting in front of me [Mr. PLATT] say the other day during this discussion that the State of Connecticut was abundantly able to educate her own children, and he spoke it proudly, and he had a right to be proud of it. I say that the State of Texas is able to educate her own children, white and black; and if that be true, how could I with any degree of propriety come in and ask this Government to help us when we are perfectly able to help ourselves? I can not do it.

The tendency of the times, and to my mind it is alarming, is that upon every occasion when there is trouble in one of the States, instead of relying upon themselves, upon their own individuality, upon their own independence, upon their own resources, and upon the strength of their own laws, they apply at once to Washington and ask help here. The tendency is to convert this into a parental government, a centralized power, and to strengthen this Government by weakening the States, to strengthen this Government by lessening in the people that independence which is the very bulwark and vital force of every State, the manhood and individuality of its people. That to my mind is a strong point.

Then, again, I have always felt that I would rather eat the crust of independence than the dainties of charity. I mean so as a man; I mean so as a representative. I heard the Senator from Ohio, whose State has received such manifest aid in land donations from this Government in the development of her school system, in this discussion say that he was not willing to trust the South. Well, Mr. President, there might be some mutuality about that. I say to that Senator that whenever I ask him to trust me or my people with this money it will be time to throw that up to us. I do not ask the help of this Government to the support and education of our people in this matter.

Six years ago when there was a bill pending for the distribution of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States we were then poor, impoverished, not able to help ourselves as now. That was in, I believe, 1876, when the dark pall of financial distress covered the entire South, when land was not salable, when money was hard to get, and when we were struggling to educate the blacks as well as the whites in our country, and a bill was introduced by my distinguished friend from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] to distribute the net proceeds of the sales of public lands for schools. I voted for it, and thought it was right to vote for a proposition of that kind.

I would do it now, because it would be simply partially placing the States on the same footing which some States already occupy by munificent land donations. But when it comes to this bill, as to the people of Texas, I say we can get along without it; we do not need it. As to Mississippi, I can not tell; I do not know. I do not know about any of the States of the South except the one in which I live, so far as their internal condition is concerned. They speak for themselves, and their votes will indicate their views in regard to this. I only speak for myself, for the State which I in part represent. Doubtless there are some people in Texas who would act differently on this bill; but I know that I am striving to represent the best interests of the State. I know that it is the wisest policy for Texas to control absolutely her school system. I know that it is her policy to educate her children to the very utmost of her ability, and I know that she is willing to do it. From the day we won our independence to this good hour we have had exclusive control of our school affairs, and there is not one State in this Union more deeply impressed with the importance of education; and for myself I say that no man in Texas is a stronger friend than I to common schools, and no man pays his school-tax more cheerfully.

In regard to the education of the colored people, about which a good deal has been said, I beg to say that I do not put it on the ground of sentimentality, and I do not go back into that compromise which was made in the Constitution between certain Northern and Middle States and certain Southern States in respect to the time when the importation of or the admission of such persons as any of the States saw proper to admit should not be prohibited prior to 1808. I do not put it on that ground. Indeed, if you will examine history right closely, it will be difficult to tell what were the various conflicting and important elements that were reconciled in order to secure a Union, and you will find that that great State of Virginia, represented in the convention by Mason, by Madison, and by Randolph, was in favor of stopping absolutely the importation of slaves. Their motives were impugned. It was said that they opposed it not because they opposed servitude, but because they made money in Virginia in that character of traffic. So it is to-day. Whatever opinions a man entertains some people will find fault with him. Those illustrious men of Virginia were honest, sagacious, broad-minded, and expressed their sincere views, and were to my mind clearly right. I do not put it upon that ground. I do not put it upon the ground of constitutionality. I put it upon the ground that the people of Texas, and I believe of every Southern State and of every State in the Union, will act wisely and do better to take care of their own schools and depend upon their own resources.

In regard to the colored people and their education, as I stated, I do not put that on sentimentality, but upon practical common sense. They are made citizens, and live among us. Both races are there to stay whether we would or no; they are entitled to vote, entitled to hold office, to sit upon juries, to be administrators, and so on, and it is a practical common-sense question that as they have these rights it is the interest of the States that these men shall be educated as far as their capacity will admit; and outside of all sentimentality on the subject, as a broad question of the best interests of the country, I say that our interest requires us to educate those people. We so regard it in Texas, and hence we have done what I have stated. We divide our money squarely and fairly, share and share alike, between the white children and the colored children for their education as well as ours, claiming only that the great division line which God Almighty has drawn shall be kept up. They educate their children on one side, and we ours on the other.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Permit me to ask whether there was any portion of the Peabody fund expended in Texas?

Mr. MAXEY. I think so. I think that Dr. Sears, and after him Dr. Curry, distributed some of it.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. They accepted a portion of that fund.

Mr. MAXEY. Dr. Sears, the first manager of the Peabody fund, came down and distributed a portion of it, and they accepted it, and since then Dr. Curry has distributed some. I do not know that any portion of that Peabody fund came out of the pockets of the people of Florida or of any other State of this Union by taxation. Mr. Peabody made the greater portion of his fortune in England in honorable commerce, and Mr. Peabody had a right to do with his money as he pleased, without asking Congress or anybody else that I know of anything about it. When that wise-minded philanthropist made his will giving to the Southern States a certain portion of his estate for school purposes, and the distributers of that fund came to Texas, there are several places there that received their due share, and I only regret that there was not more of it; and if any other great philanthropist were to come along and be willing to endow the University of Texas or to appropriate money of his own making, without taxation of the people, to the common-school system of the State of Texas, I would say to the people, accept it, as no doubt they would, and I say that they would be right in doing so, because a man has a right to do with his own as he pleases, so he does not injure anybody; and when Mr. Peabody saw proper to dispose of his money as he pleased it is not for me or the Senator from Florida to say whether he was right or wrong or the people right or wrong in accepting it. So much for that.

I have said, Mr. President, about all that I desired to say, and only add in conclusion that I perfectly appreciate the views of gentlemen who differ with me. It is a question of expediency. I put it on that ground. I do not regard it as expedient myself; other gentlemen do, and every man should be controlled by what he regards to be his highest duty to the people he represents. I yield to no man in earnest desire for the spread of intelligence. I believe that the State is the true trustee of her own school fund, and that the people of each State are magnanimous enough and have the ability to raise the money for this great purpose.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator permit me to put in two or three facts from the census that are pertinent to the remarks of the Senator from Texas before he goes on?

Mr. BROWN. I yield for that argument.

Mr. BLAIR. I would say, then, that Texas has by the census a total population of 1,591,749. Missouri has a population of 2,168,380. Indiana has a population of 1,978,301. Texas, it is claimed, has increased more rapidly than any other State, and has now substantially 2,000,000 or more, and doubtless as large a school population as Indiana or Missouri. I, however, give the figures of the census. The State of Texas expends for school purposes $753,346, or did in the year 1881.

Mr. MAXEY. In the year 1883, as I stated, our expenditure in Texas was over $1,100,000.

Mr. BLAIR. It has been largely increased, then. I take the latest general return, which gives a sum of $3.26 to each child of the school population; and after the $15,000,000 is distributed, if it should be so, Texas would have $6.66 for each one of her school population, which is only between 8 and 14 as I recollect, while in other States the ages are in some 4 to 21. That is the appropriation of Texas for her common schools, $753,346. The State of Missouri, which has no larger population probably to-day, expends $3,152,000 for the same purpose, or four times as much as the State of Texas per capita of actual school population based on the census.

Mr. MAXEY rose.

Mr. BLAIR. Permit me to get my figures in.

Mr. MAXEY. The Senator will bear in mind that the population of Texas is made up of an incoming immigration of not less than from one hundred and fifty to two hundred thousand people every year.

Mr. BLAIR. I know Texas is booming and the population very rapidly increasing. Probably it is already larger than that of the State of Missouri; but I am giving cold-iron figures here, which I commend to Senators as the basis of deduction. I was saying that the State of Missouri expended $3,152,178 the same year, while the State of Indiana expended $4,528,754, or more than six times the amount expended by the State of Texas per capita of school population.

Mr. MAXEY. The Senator had better turn now to the relative wealth of Indiana and Texas.

Mr. BLAIR. I beg the Senator's pardon. I do not understand him.

Mr. MAXEY. The amount of school tax is based on the wealth.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator touches on a vital point of this whole debate. Texas is poor, and undoubtedly she taxes herself as largely as she is able to pay; but nevertheless the necessity of education to a Texas child is as great as it is to a New Hampshire or a Massachusetts child. The Massachusetts child has the benefit of almost $20 per capita annually, and the Texas child only a little over $3 at the present time; and yet it can not be claimed that it is not as expensive, even more expensive, to educate a Texas child because of the lack of the plant, the facilities, the machinery to do it, all of which have to be supplied; and I do not think that the Senator quite considers all aspects of this problem in the view which he takes.

A SENATOR. They are rich in Texas.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not know. They seem to feel rich and increase in goods, but do not seem to know that they are poor and blind and naked and have need of all this, if we can be guided in these things by the figures of the census.

The necessities are greater in the Southern States, as I said before, and the capacity to pay is very much less. There is no question whatever that the masses of the people in Texas, whether the Senator perceives it or not, white and colored, want this appropriation, and I assure the Senator that he may well reconsider his position if he thinks in what he has said here to-day that he represents the people of Texas so far as this demand is concerned. In assure him that there are sources of information given to all members of the Senate, and we are not left necessarily to admit that the most authentic are those which we hear in the way of statements on this floor.

Mr. FRYE. What is the illiteracy of Texas?

Mr. BLAIR. I am talking in the time of the Senator from Georgia. I have not those figures. Look in the RECORD of the 19th and you will find it all. One thing more I wish to say.

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator permit me to say a word?

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly.

Mr. COKE. I desire to say that the State of Texas has provided a school fund of thirty-odd million acres of land in addition to three and one-half million of stocks bearing interest, beside the proportion of the ad valorem annual tax levied and collected for school purposes. The available school fund for the last year was a little under $1,200,000; it was $1,100,000 and something which was expended. This fund is growing constantly; the lands are being converted into notes bearing interest, running a long time, and each succeeding year finds the school fund greatly increased. Those lands that are not being sold are being leased for grazing purposes at from 8 to 20 cents per acre per annum. The people of the State have heretofore been rich in unavailable property in land. They have been taxed heavily, considering their available assets, for school purposes.

Mr. BROWN. I yielded to the Senator from New Hampshire. I was willing to give him time to put in his figures.

Mr. COKE. I shall be through in a moment.

Mr. BROWN. I would rather not yield longer than a minute more.

Mr. COKE. I only wanted to state what the school fund of Texas is and what it is rapidly growing to be and will be in a very short time under the enhancement of values that is going on there. The taxable values of the last year in Texas increased $113,000,000, or 25 per cent. I mention these facts to show what in a few years will be the capacity of the State for educating her children. As the Senator from Georgia will yield no longer I can not go further, as I would like to do in stating facts bearing on this subject.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator will then permit me to simply say this: that the population and necessities of Texas are growing much more rapidly than the school fund. The school fund is now in land very largely. She has made magnificent provision for the future, but her immediate necessities are not inferior to those of almost any other Southern State; and the Senator will find that to be so if he examines the returns.

Mr. COKE. I think I know all about it.

Mr. BLAIR. One other point I wish to state, and that is in regard to the constitutional question that comes up continually. Here is the Burnside bill, the Morrill bill, the Hoar bill, including the public lands and the public money as well——

Mr. BROWN. I did not yield for a speech.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia resumes the floor, as is his right.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, probably at no time has there been a more important question before the Senate of the United States than the one now under consideration. It rises above all political parties; and in what I have to say on the subject I shall certainly not intend to make any allusion to party politics which can be distasteful to any one, because I think it entirely inappropriate.

Mr. President, the ways of Providence are beyond our comprehension. When the late unfortunate civil war was commenced neither side contemplated the abolition of slavery; and certainly nobody thought that the slaves would be set free and made citizens, with all the rights of citizens. I know we did not expect it in the South, and I may say I know it was not the expectation of the Union side, because only the day after the first battle of Bull Run, or Manassas as we called it South, the Congress of the United States passed a resolution solemnly declaring in substance that it was no part of the purpose of the United States to abolish slavery in the States, but only to preserve the Union and enforce subjection to the laws.

But Providence had a deeper design, and as the war progressed it began to be developed that the abolition of slavery was a necessity to the Union. We finally reached a point where the President of the United States felt it his duty to issue his proclamation proclaiming the freedom of the slaves. He contemplated no such thing at the commencement of the struggle. At the end of it we of the South were not only required to abandon our claim to our slaves and to adopt a constitutional amendment declaring their freedom forever, but we were also required before our status in the Union could again be adjusted to vote to incorporate two other provisions into the Constitution, and clothe the emancipated slaves with all the rights of full-fledged citizens.

I say then, Mr. President, slavery was abolished and the slaves were made freemen and citizens with all the rights of citizens as a necessity of the Union. What then was the duty of the Union? If the Union took a slave from his master as a matter of necessity, and made a freeman and a citizen of him and imposed on him the obligations and duties of citzenship, I hold that it was the duty of the Union to aid in his qualification for the discharge of those duties. If that is true, then it was the duty of all the States of the Union, or in other words of the Federal Government, to take such action as is necessary to qualify these new-made citizens to exercise the functions and duties of citizens. They were ignorant; no matter whether our policy as slave-owners was right or wrong, they were grossly ignorant. When it became necessary for the purposes of the Union and the Government to make citizens of them it was a fearful experiment in their then condition of ignorance. How natural was it, then, that the representatives of all the States when they came to contemplate this danger should desire to avert it.

The danger is to the whole Union from the exercise of the ballot in the hands of those new-made citizens, who were utterly unqualified on account of their ignorance. Was it the duty in this case of the whole Union or of the States of their residence to educate the former slaves, now citizens and their children, so as to qualify them for the exercise of the rights of citizenship? Clearly it was the duty of all the States combined or of the Union, and not the duty of the States where they resided and where they had formerly been slaves. Nor was it the duty of their late owners, who by emancipation had lost their value, amounting to about $2,000,000,000. Then, if it is the duty of the whole Union to educate them up to the point of average citizens, it is right to pass this bill or some bill like this whereby the whole Union out of its own Treasury will aid in this work, and not put it upon the shoulders of the people of any one State or any dozen States where the great bulk of them may be located as residents of the different States.

There is another strong reason why this course should be taken by the Union, and it is found in the fact that the Southern States were so impoverished by the war that however willing they may be to aid this great work, they are not able to do it alone. It is not their duty unaided to do it, and if it were they are not able.

I do not care to make any issue at present with the honorable Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] on his position yesterday, that when the slave was set free and became a citizen the State lost nothing, as he was still a member of the community, whose labor went to support the State and to enhance values in the community. But there is this distinction that I presume will not be questioned: If the State did not lose its population the owners lost their property in the slaves, and when it became necessary to impose a tax for the education of their own children and the children of their former slaves, those who were then the only tax-payers and are now to a great extent the tax-payers, are not able, as they then were, to respond to the necessary tax. During the slavery period, when the owners of the slaves controlled their labor and made it more efficient than it can now be made, they had the means, if it had been necessary, or if the line of policy had then been adopted that we are now seeking to adopt, to have borne the tax and educated the mass; but when the negroes were set free and they no longer owned them they lost that property they had in them, and they were no longer able to pay the taxes that they could have paid before the slaves were set free; and the slaves who were set free in their poverty have not yet been able to accumulate a sufficient amount of property to enable them to pay the taxes which the owners would then have been able to pay.

Take my own State as an illustration. The year before the war the citizens of the State of Georgia gave in and paid tax on about $680,000,000 worth of property; I do not remember the exact amount. The year after the war, slavery being abolished, and all the other losses that they had sustained by the destruction of property by the armies and by other causes having been realized, their sworn returns only aggregated one hundred and eighty-odd millions, showing an actual loss on the taxable values of the property of Georgia the year after the war as compared with the year before the war in round numbers of $500,000,000.

There is this additional consideration to be taken into the account in discussing the question of our financial ability.

We in the South maintained out of our property the armies of the confederacy for the whole period of the war. We on our side, as you on your side, issued bonds and treasury notes to meet the current expenses. Ours depreciated much more than yours, because our credit was not so good. At the end of the war all the bonds and notes and obligations of every character which we had taken from the confederate government for our property that was used during the war were ashes in our hands—they were all repudiated.

On your side it was not so. Outside of the great misfortune of the loss of life, you had sustained but little other real injury. The armies of the confederacy had not invaded to any considerable extent the territory then occupied by the Union forces. They had only on one or two occasions ventured across what we then termed the line. They had committed depredations of course, but very small in comparison with those that had been committed by the armies of the Union on what was then termed our side of the line. What was the result? You put your produce or anything that the Army needed into the notes and bonds and obligations of the Government of the United States. At the end of the war your citizens who had taken those obligations from what was then your Government had a perfectly solvent security for every dollar, and your people lost nothing of all the investments that they made at high prices for their property for the support of the armies. Our people lost all theirs by the repudiation of all their notes and bonds. Therefore our property was destroyed to the full extent of all that was necessary to support our armies for the four years of the war, and to the extent of all that was taken by the Union armies on what we then termed our territory and all that was destroyed by both armies by fire and otherwise. There again we were greatly impoverished while you were not; you have very little of that sort of loss.

Then, in addition to that, when we returned to the Union and resumed our status as States in the Union with representation we had to assume our proportion of your war debt. Of course a citizen of Georgia is just as liable to pay his part of the taxes necessary to support the Federal Government and pay the war debt as a citizen of New York is. There was, therefore, that additional burden upon us, and that even was not all.

Just before the end of the war and at the end of the war, and even after the cessation of hostilities, though before the President proclaimed the termination of the struggle, large quantities of our property, under the captured-and-abandoned-property act, as it was termed, were captured or seized by the authorities of the United States and sent North, sold in New York and other markets, and the money paid into the Treasury of the United States. That impoverished us to that extent again. And even to-day there are over $10,000,000 of the proceeds of the sale of the property, much of which, especially cotton, was seized after the termination of hostilities and after the surrender of Lee and Johnston. It was taken and sold and the money paid into the Treasury, and it now lies in the Treasury of the United States.

The Supreme Court of the United States has solemnly adjudicated the question, and determined that the Government of the United States has no title whatever to that money and holds it as a trustee. But we can not get it out of the Treasury, because there is a bar of the statute of limitations, which only ran for two years, and very few of the people of the South knew it was running till the bar was fixed. The bar of the statute of limitations prevents the owners of this money from suing in the Court of Claims to recover that which the Supreme Court admits belongs to them.

At this session, doubtless from the purest motives—I question nobody's motives, nor was there any politics in it—the Judiciary Committee of the Senate has reported back adversely a bill introduced by me the object of which was to remove the bar of the statute and permit suits to be brought for that money, with no minority report in favor of the bill.

Again, at the end of the war Congress imposed upon us what is known as the cotton tax, by which about $60,000,000 was collected from the Southern planters by a tax law since declared unconstitutional and void by the Supreme Court of the United States. That sixty millions of our money still lies in the Treasury, and the Government refuses to pay it back.

I simply recite these things to show that we were greatly impoverished. We not only lost our property in all the slaves, but we lost the property that it took to support our armies for four years, and the amount of property that was taken by your armies on what was then termed our soil for that length of time. We lost the whole of that and the other large sums I have mentioned. And we were left in a very impoverished condition.

In addition to that, the slaves were set free in our midst; they became citizens of our States; we were willing to educate them; we realized the situation. The popular sentiment at once was that, being citizens, we ought to make of them the best citizens in our power; that they could never be good citizens unless they were educated; and we went to work doing all in our power to educate them. But what could Georgia do in her impoverished condition for the education of a large mass of her own poor class of white people and the entire mass of colored people when she paid taxes on one hundred and eighty-odd millions of dollars only? It was simply an impossibility. We could not do it. At this time it is not a great deal better.

So far as the wealth the States had in the slaves, as they formerly were, now citizens, is concerned, it has not been eminently productive thus far. The figures have been quoted here again and again. There is no question about the truth of them, I suppose, and they show that from 1870 to 1880 there was a loss in the bulk of the property of the Southern States except in three. I believe Georgia, Texas, and North Carolina increased the taxable value of their property of 1870 in the return of 1880. All the other Southern States had fallen below the return of 1870. They are doing better since 1880. But except Texas there are none of the Southern States to-day that are in anything like a reasonably good condition to meet this vast responsibility.

I do not consider that we are asking charity, as some of the Senators on my side of the Chamber have said rather tauntingly of this bill, when we appeal to the Union and say the slaves were emancipated and made citizens for the benefit of the Union and as a necessity to the Union and we ask the Union now to come forward and help to qualify them for the discharge of their duties as citizens. It is not a charity, no more a charity taken from Massachusetts than from Georgia. It is the duty of each of the States to contribute her part through the Treasury of the Union to the education and enlightenment of this population.

Then I do not feel, as some of the Senators on my side of the Chamber seem to feel from the remarks they have made, that we are accepting a charity from the Northern section of the Union when the purse of the Union is opened and out of her Treasury money is paid to aid education. We ask no charity. We demand it as a right. I do not believe that you feel you are dispensing charity, nor that you expect us to feel that we are receiving charity; but we are all mutually discharging an obligation of a very high and sacred character that rests upon us. If it was right to make these people citizens—and I do not question it now—then it is right to qualify them as citizens, and to do that you have to educate them, and I say the people of the whole Union are alike interested in this question. The people of New England, or of the great West, can no more afford to have an immense mass of ignorant voters in another section than you could in your own, and you can not afford it at all.

The perpetuity of the Union and the stability of the Government depend on the virtue and intelligence of the people. The people of every section of the Union are interested in the virtue and intelligence of the whole. There is a mutual interest and a common danger.

Whenever you incorporate States and people into the Union you should do all you can to prepare them as citizens of the Union; and if they are too poor to educate themselves, and the States where they are are impoverished so that they are not able to educate them, then the preservation of the Union and its perpetuity depend upon the Federal Government making the appropriation necessary to aid in their education until they can educate themselves.

I do not say this ought to be permanent. I do not think so. Here is now a great emergency. We are in the midst of it, and we only ask for help until the emergency is past. Make the appropriation until we have reached the point where by loading ourselves with taxation as heavily as other States of the Union to educate the mass we may be able to do it. Then we will take the burden, and take it very cheerfully; but you must bear in mind, Senators, as has been stated to you over and over again by the statistics presented by the chairman of the committee [Mr. BLAIR], whose course in this whole struggle has been able, liberal, and just, that the Southern States to-day upon the taxable property owned by them are taxing themselves as heavily for the education of their whole population as any of the Northern or Western States are. The Senator from New Hampshire has read to us from statistics over and again the statements that verify what I have just said.

And let me tell you, furthermore, that the popular sentiment in the Southern States requires the education of the children of both races. There are some exceptions to the rule, but I speak of the mass of the people when I say that they are for general education and enlightenment. As the colored people are now citizens, having equal legal rights with us, let us give them, say our people, all the advantages of citizenship and prepare them to make the best citizens possible. That, in my judgment, is the proper view. That is the view, I believe, of a large majority of the white people of every State in the South.

Then we only appeal to you to take upon your own shoulders your just part of the burden during this emergency. Is it unreasonable? I think not. I have said that we are willing to do all we can for their education.

Now, I want to refer to a fact that I think ought to be sufficient evidence of the truth of this statement. During the last scholastic year there were raised in the Southern States, in round numbers, $13,000,000 for educational purposes. Of that $13,000,000 the white people paid a little over $11,000,000 and the colored people not quite $2,000,000. In the expenditure of it there were a little over $5,000,000 paid by the white people which went to the education of the colored children, and not quite $6,000,000 to the white children. Therefore nearly half of the tax paid by the whites, over a third of it considerably, went to the education of the colored children; and for every dollar that the colored population paid in taxes they got back nearly $3 in school fund or tuition. I think this is evidence that we are doing the best we can for their education, that we are not trying to oppress them, that we are not trying to trample them down.

I know there has been an agitation in some of the States, and probably the law has been in force in one or two of the States, that the colored people should be required to educate themselves; in other words, that their children should be educated only out of the taxes paid by them. That would be, on the part of the States there, the same repudiation of the obligations of the State to aid in their education that it seems to me it would be on the part of the Union to refuse aid to the extent I have already mentioned. But we have not done so.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to ask him to name those Southern States where the law is as he has just stated?

Mr. BROWN. I say I have been informed—I am not sure that I am right—I have understood that the State of Kentucky formerly had that rule and has repealed it, and that now——

Mr. HARRISON. I understand it has not been repealed; though the Supreme Court has decided it to be unconstitutional it still stands on the statute-book of Kentucky.

Mr. BLAIR. It is in process of repeal by the Legislature, so I have been informed.

Mr. BROWN. That was my information. I thought the bill had been passed.

Mr. BLAIR. I can not state the exact status of it. I think one house has voted to repeal it. My informant is an intelligent gentleman. The fact may be that they keep an unconstitutional law on their statute-book.

Mr. HARRISON. Until they adopt some other basis it still stands as representative of the sentiment and opinion of their Legislature.

Mr. BLAIR. There is only Delaware besides Kentucky where the distribution is not equal.

Mr. BROWN. I was just going to state that I understood there was only Delaware——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me?

Mr. BROWN. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The law of Kentucky devoted the whole of the taxation of the colored people to the education of their children. There then go to that fund certain fines and penalties. After the court decided the law unconstitutional the commissioner of education distributed the fund to the colored schools as well as to the white, and there is a bill now pending in the Kentucky Legislature to repeal the law. That is the condition of it.

Mr. BROWN. I was simply going to make this remark: Admitting that the State of Kentucky and the State of Delaware have both had that law, I do not believe Delaware was on our side in the great contest. I have no recollection of the Delaware regiments in the Southern armies. And if my memory serves me right Kentucky had a very divided jurisdiction at that time.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator will allow me a moment. I believe the law of my State does appropriate every dollar raised from the taxation of colored people to the education of colored children. In addition to that, the very last Legislature appropriated out of the State treasury an additional sum of $5,000 to the colored schools of the State, and besides the taxes raised there are certain receipts from licenses and things of that kind that go into the fund.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is sure that all the tax collected from the colored people of Delaware is applied to the education of colored children?

Mr. SAULSBURY. That is the law.

Mr. BROWN. With the permission of the Senators I will now proceed.

I believe I may justly say, then, as the result of the explanations, that no one of the Southern States that was recognized by the Government to be in rebellion during the war has passed any law discriminating against the colored children. They have put all upon an equality, colored and white. They have not put them in the same school-houses, nor do we think it will ever be their interest to do that. The colored race themselves did not ask it in Georgia. But a colored member of the Legislature of Georgia introduced an amendment to the educational bill that the schools should be forever kept separate, and it was adopted. And at the same time a white member followed with another amendment that the colored race should always have their fair and just proportion of the common fund raised for that purpose, and we have never had any difficulty on this question in my State. We have none to-day; there is no misunderstanding on the school question between the two races in Georgia. In my own city of Atlanta, where we tax the people of Atlanta to support the public schools and the teachers are paid out of the treasury of the city, we have very handsome buildings for the colored children as we have for the white, and we pay the teachers of all of them out of the treasury, and open the door to every child, white and colored. That is the feeling in my State; I believe that is the feeling generally in the Southern States. But when we have done all that we can do in that line, we are not able to educate the children as they ought to be educated. We are not able to do for them what is necessary to be done to make them such citizens of the United States as they ought to be when they grow up. Now, I think I may justly appeal to Senators who were on the other side of the line when we were at war with each other and say, "Come and help us until we have passed this emergency and until we have enlightened these people, and then they can help us by taking their own place as part of the intelligent population, and we shall then have no trouble about taking care of ourselves in the future." We are interested in this great result. You are equally interested.

Now a few remarks on the constitutional question in this case, and I shall close my argument. It has been gravely questioned on this floor whether the Congress of the United States has the power under the Constitution to make an appropriation of this character. If we have not that power, however oppressive it may be on the Southern States to make provision for the education of the colored children as well as their own children and however great the misfortune to the Union may be if we should fail to make it, still we have no right to do it unless we can find the grant in the Constitution.

I know that those of us who are strict constructionists have seldom been willing to admit that we find the authority for anything under the general clause for the promotion of the general welfare. I believe I never heard any one who belongs to my school of politics admit that a particular power fell under the general-welfare clause. If no other power falls there, then as there is nothing that I am aware of which can do so much to promote the general welfare as the general diffusion of knowledge I am willing to put this under the general-welfare clause, and say that if the framers of the Constitution meant nothing else by that clause, they did mean that Congress might make appropriations for the education of the people to prepare them for the exercise of the rights of citizenship. Under that clause I think I am justified in this statement by the action of the fathers of the Republic who framed the Constitution. They surely knew what they meant, and they were men of that character for integrity and honesty of purpose that they would in no case have willfully violated that instrument.

In his first annual address, as it was then called, President Washington said:

> Nor am I less persuaded that you will agree with me in opinion that there is nothing which can better deserve your patronage than the promotion of science and literature. Knowledge is in every country the surest basis of public happiness. In one in which the measures of government receive their impressions so immediately from the sense of the community as in ours, it is proportionably essential. To the security of a free constitution it contributes in various ways: by convincing those who are intrusted with the public administration that every valuable end of government is best answered by the enlightened confidence of the people, and by teaching the people themselves to know and value their own rights; to discern and provide against invasions of them; to distinguish between oppression and the necessary exercise of lawful authority; between burdens proceeding from a disregard to their convenience and those resulting from the inevitable exigencies of society; to discriminate the spirit of liberty from that of licentiousness, cherishing the first, avoiding the last, and uniting a speedy but temperate vig lance against encroachments with an inviolable respect to the laws.
> Whether this desirable object will be best promoted by affording aid to seminaries of learning already established, by the institution of a national university, or by any other expedients, will be well worthy of a place in the deliberations of the legislature.

Again, he says in his eighth annual message:

> I have therefore proposed to the consideration of Congress the expediency of establishing a national university and also a military academy. The desirableness of both these institutions has so constantly increased with every new view I have taken on the subject, that I cannot omit the opportunity of once for all recalling your attention to it.
> The assembly to which I address myself is too enlightened not to be fully sensible how much a flourishing state of the arts and sciences contributes to national prosperity and education.
> True it is that our country, much to its honor, contains many seminaries of learning highly respectable and useful; but the funds upon which they rest are too narrow to command the ablest professors in the different departments of liberal knowledge for the institution contemplated, though they would be excellent auxiliaries.
> Among the motives to such an institution, the assimilation of the principles, opinions, and manners of our countrymen, by the common education of a portion of our youth from every quarter, well deserves attention. The more homogeneous our citizens can be made in these particulars, the greater will be our prospect of permanent union; and a primary object of such a national institution should be the education of our youth in the science of government. In a republic, what species of knowledge can be equally important, and what duty more pressing on its Legislature than to patronize a plan for communicating it to those who are to be the future guardians of the liberties of the country?

Mr. Jefferson also has something to say upon this question. In his sixth annual message he says:

> The present consideration of a national establishment for education particularly is rendered proper by this circumstance also, that if Congress, approving the proposition, shall yet think it more eligible to found it on a donation of lands, they have it now in their power to endow it with those which will be among the earliest to produce the necessary income. This foundation would have the advantage of being independent of war, which may suspend other improvements by requiring for its own purposes the resources destined for them.

Mr. Madison, in his eighth annual message, says:

> The importance which I have attached to the establishment of a university within this District, on a scale and for objects worthy of the American nation, induces me to renew my recommendation of it to the favorable consideration of Congress.

President John Quincy Adams, speaking on the same subject, says:

> Among the first, perhaps the very first, instrument for the improvement of the condition of men is knowledge; and to the acquisition of much of the knowledge adapted to the wants, the comforts, and enjoyments of human life public institutions and seminaries of learning are essential. So convinced of this was the first of my predecessors in this office, now first in the memory as living he was first in the hearts of our countrymen, that once and again in his addresses to the Congress with whom he co-operated in the public service he earnestly recommended the establishment of seminaries of learning, to prepare for all the emergencies of peace and war—a national university and a military academy. With respect to the latter, had he lived to the present day, in turning his eyes to the institution at West Point he would have enjoyed the gratification of his most earnest wishes. But in surveying the city which has been honored with his name he would have seen the spot of earth which he had destined and bequeathed to the use and benefit of his country as the site for a university still bare and barren.

These high authorities had none of the scruples that we now entertain on the subject of State rights when they thought of the education and enlightenment of the people. They considered knowledge the most essential thing, and they seemed to consider it appropriate for Congress to interfere and found a great university for the whole country and other seminaries of learning. If they took that view of it at so early a day after the formation of the Constitution, why should we now scruple so much about it? It seems to me there is no room for constitutional trouble on this question.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator from Georgia permit me to interrupt him there?

Mr. BROWN. Oh, yes.

Mr. MAXEY. The Senator from Georgia will find by referring to the debates on the Constitution that the subject of a university in this District was specially named, and it was passed over with the single remark I believe of Roger Sherman that the exclusive jurisdiction over the ten miles square carried with it the right to establish a university. That applied alone to the fact that Congress had the exclusive legislation and power here.

Mr. BROWN. Yes; but in establishing the university there was a little more than that necessary. It had to be supported; and Mr. Jefferson suggests that instead of doing it by money they do it by donations of the lands of the Union. It seems his scruples were not in the way when it came to appropriating lands for the endowment of the university; and I think there is no Senator here who can draw an intelligent distinction between the appropriation of the public domain which is the property of the Union and the appropriation of money which is the property of the Union for the endowment of a university or for the support of the cause of education.

Mr. MAXEY. If the Senator will permit me, the distinction which I think was drawn was that in all the States, as a matter of course, each Legislature legislated for the State; but in the District of Columbia (it is now called the District of Columbia, but was not then), in the ten miles square, Congress was the Legislature exclusively for that ten miles square, and within that it had a right to establish a university.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator from Texas is right as to the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress over the District of Columbia, where it was proposed to locate the university. But he seems to forget that it was to be supported out of the lands or the money of the United States. The only trouble about the position of the Senator from Texas is, that his is not the view presented by General Washington, Mr. Madison, Mr. Jefferson, and Mr. Adams. They took a broader view of it.

Mr. MAXEY. It was the view in the debates of the convention.

Mr. BROWN. If it was the view of the convention at the time they were making a constitution, it seems that they had carefully considered the instrument after it was adopted as a whole, and they were not afraid to make the appropriation lest they would violate the Constitution. They certainly believed Congress had the constitutional power to do what they recommended and urged it to do.

I do not care to go over any of the authorities read and so ably commented on by the honorable Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] yesterday. I think he presented the case so conclusively that there will hardly be doubt about it. I only wanted to read in connection with what was so well said by him these utterances of the earliest Presidents of the United States, who had the highest confidence of our people, to show what their opinions were on this question.

There is one other single view, however, that I will refer to. Under the Constitution of the United States provision is made that "the House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature." That is the original Constitution. Then the fourteenth amendment makes this additional provision:

> All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside.

Under those provisions of the Constitution the Congress of the United States has taken upon itself to enact laws to protect the voter in elections for members of the House of Representatives. They have assumed that they have the authority to protect these citizens of the United States in the right of voting and in the free exercise of that right according to their own will and wish. Those statutes passed by Congress have come before the Supreme Court, as in the late Kuklux cases from my own State, and the power has been fully sustained by the court of last resort. If, then, the Congress of the United States has the power to pass laws to protect the voter in his right to vote and even to send men to the penitentiary who punish the voter for his vote after the election is over, as the Supreme Court held when it decided that the law was constitutional, surely Congress has power to pass laws to aid in the education of the voter, so as to enable him to cast his vote intelligently.

If Congress has power to protect the voter in the free exercise of the use of the ballot, it must have power to aid in preparing him for its intelligent use. And without educating the voter, without giving him that knowledge which General Washington speaks of as indispensable, without preparing him to understand the use of the ballot which he is casting—without, in other words, preparing him for the duty of citizenship, he can not be a citizen, at least not a useful citizen. He can not be a voter—a safe, intelligent voter. If, then, his condition without education is not that of a safe, intelligent voter, and we protect him so amply in the exercise of his right to cast the ballot, have we not a right to prepare him to read and to write his ballot and to cast it intelligently? It seems to me there can be no doubt on the question. I am, therefore, very clearly of the opinion that there is no constitutional difficulty in the way of the passage of this bill.

Now a word in reference to Texas. My friend from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] has interrupted me a time or two, and I am always willing to hear him.

Mr. MAXEY. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BROWN. It is no interruption that I complain of. I envy his situation. All the Southern States may well envy the State of Texas, and the Southern Senators may well envy the Senators from Texas. You have a magnificent domain, larger than the Republic of France, larger than the Empire of Germany, one over which a man may travel nine hundred miles in a direct line and still be within the jurisdiction of the State of Texas. That magnificent territory is all your own, and you have had the wisdom to appropriate it to the purposes of a university and free schools and the education of your people. I admit you are independent. With from thirty to forty million acres of land to be applied to this great purpose of education in addition to what has already been done, I know of no power on earth so independent. I congratulate you, and I am only sorry that Georgia has not the same independence and the same important advantages. If you do not need this aid, you know your Southern sisters do need it. If you are enriched by this immense territory, we were impoverished by the causes that I have already mentioned, and while I know it is a matter of no concern to you in dollars and cents, yet as a State in the Union, and as I said in the outset the slaves having been set free as a necessity of the Union, you should, it seems to me, be willing to come up and do your part in meeting the obligation that rests upon the Union to prepare those people who were made citizens for the preservation of the Union for the exercise of intelligent citizenship in the Union.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, a remark made by me in the commencement of this discussion has excited some comment from Senators on the other side of the Chamber, and I think it proper for me now to answer them briefly and to state a little more explicitly my view in reference to this very important subject of the education of the illiterate children of the United States.

At the close of the war there was a universal feeling throughout the Northern States that it was the duty of the National Government to aid the Southern States in the education especially of the freedmen of the South. I believe that every man who participated in the policy of emancipation as declared in the thirteenth amendment felt that it carried with it the duty of fitting that population for the exercise of civil and political rights; and I believe (I say it as broadly as any Senator can express it) that it is the bounden duty of the United States to aid the Southern States in the education of this class of population. Whatever might have been said or could be said in regard to the origin of slavery and as to who was responsible for it, we all admitted that as the result of the war there was thrown upon the people of those States a burden which they could not fairly be called upon to bear alone, and that large population of four or five million people, ignorant, uneducated, from the nature of their condition after centuries of slavery totally unfit for self-government, in the outset, should be educated and should be placed in a position where they could exercise, with propriety and safety, civil and political rights.

That was the universal feeling throughout the Northern States. It was not the expectation or design at the close of the war to interfere in the slightest degree with the power of the Southern States over the question of suffrage within their borders. Nothing is clearer from the debates of Congress at that time than that the power of the States given by the Constitution of the United States to prescribe who should vote in each State was to be left to the States unimpaired. Therefore, in the fourteenth amendment, which was the landmark, the groundwork of reconstruction, which I believe was more wisely and carefully considered than any proposition in regard to reconstruction, the right of the Southern States and of all the States to prescribe who should be voters within their limits was plainly not granted because it existed, but recognized, and the power of those States to determine who among their people should vote was clearly acknowledged.

There were two or three things which occurred about that time which cast their shadow upon all our future history. The first and most important of all was the death of Abraham Lincoln by the hand of an assassin. Everybody is intelligent enough now to appreciate how grave a misfortune that was to the people both North and South, because if Mr. Lincoln had lived, with the strong affection that existed for him in the North and I believe with the kindly regard that had sprung up for this man of wonderful character in the South, there was a feeling that he would be a kind of arbiter or middle-man between the passions excited in the North and the South, and that he probably would point out the way and be the guardian and the guide of the two sections wasted by civil war, and bring about some good and wise measures of reconstruction. But he was carried off by the hand of an assassin.

Then I hope I am not trenching upon politics when I say that the unfortunate temper and quarrel of his successor, the sudden change made in the policy of Mr. Johnson from what he had said in speeches to what he did afterward, undoubtedly exercised a very bad influence both in the North and in the South. In the South it excited a hope that the reasonable safeguards demanded by the North could be safely rejected by that section. In the North it excited the feeling of strong resentment and antagonism.

I have no doubt that those two events added greatly to the difficulties that fell upon Congress after the close of the war.

Then I ought to add what was, I think, rather the consequence of the course pursued by President Johnson, the unfortunate laws, as they were called, passed in many of the Southern States, which practically reduced the colored race in the South to a condition of servitude. Many of the laws under which they had been accustomed in the South to deal with those people as slaves were perpetuated. While they recognized that slavery was abolished, yet many of the incidents of slavery were kept up and passed into law and were enforced in nearly all the Southern States, especially in the cotton States. This created in the North a feeling of bitter antagonism, for those laws were read in every part of the United States, and excited a strong feeling against the South, checking that kindly flow which followed the close of the civil war.

Those laws were regarded as an outrage on the part of the South, and therefore the Northern sentiment came gradually to the conclusion that there was no other safeguard to the freedman of the South except to arm him with the ballot. I know with what reluctance the Republicans of the Northern States came to the conclusion that there was no other way to deal with the question of the negroes in the South except to arm them with the suffrage. I know how I felt myself, and I know how the common expression here was that in consequence of those untoward events we felt that there was no half-way house, that there was no way short of conferring upon the colored man of the South the right to vote, believing, as we then thought, that that would be the great safeguard by which he could protect himself in the enjoyment of civil and political rights.

This was the controversy and these were the troubles that came upon us. Then came the adoption of the fifteenth amendment. Whether that was a wise measure or not time alone can tell. I shall not pass judgment upon it; the future must pass judgment upon it; but the immediate effect of the passage of the fifteenth amendment upon the Southern States was to excite a strong feeling of hostility against the vote by the negro and to create great excitement. That was manifest. They feared what they called in common parlance "nigger rule," and that the effect of that amendment would be to place over them the power of an uneducated class of people who had no opportunities of education, who were confessedly not able, from the want of education and intelligence, to rule or govern themselves, much less the people among whom they lived. And it was this excited feeling in the South that led them in the first place to organize to prevent the natural result of the fifteenth amendment. Although the constitutional provision was adopted giving to the negro the right to vote, yet they were determined by one means or another to prevent the negro from exercising this political power. Sir, it is the strong feeling in the Northern States that the South had so organized itself in the course of three or four or five years by such agencies as the Kuklux klan as to prevent the exercise of this right by the colored people that has kept up the excitement from that day to this.

I merely mention these as historical facts, without at all arraigning any section or any party of men.

Now, Mr. President, after this has passed over, we come still to the question as to what it is the duty of the National Government to do in respect to the education of these colored people. I said a moment ago—and I repeat it now with full reflection—that I do not think the United States when they come to deal with this matter ought to trust the settlement of the important questions that grow out of this new policy to the action of the people of the Southern States, because the force of prejudice, the force of education, is so strong and potent, even on the minds of the most intelligent men, that I do not think the United States would act wisely in conferring upon the Southern States absolute power over education and the expenditure of the money involved in it. I say this not in any feeling of unkindness to the people of the South, but from a deep conviction that owing to the prejudices of race, owing to the influences of slavery still darkening their minds, and which probably will darken their minds for two or three generations, they can not be left alone to decide how and in what manner the money to be appropriated by Congress for the education of the illiterate shall be applied.

It was in that view, and only in that view, that I said the South could not be trusted with the disposition of this question. I think so still. I think it is a question that we ought all to participate in. The policy and mode should be pointed out clearly by Congressional law, so that the object to be accomplished by the United States may be fixed, not by the law of any State, but by the judgment of the representatives of the people and of the States.

Now, Mr. President, let me go a little further and see what is necessary. This bill is reported to us, it seems to me, without sufficient information communicated to us. This bill turns over to the Southern States, where the illiteracy mainly prevails and for the relief of which this measure is mainly devoted, this whole subject to be dealt with by the laws of the States. What are the laws of those States? Take the first year's $15,000,000 appropriated as it is appropriated by this bill, giving, say, to Alabama $1,000,000, and so to the States in proportion to illiteracy. It is to be seen by the distribution that nearly all this goes to what are called the Southern States. Between eleven and twelve million dollars out of the $15,000,000 are given to those States. That is right. Why? Because the evil we are to deal with, which threatens the very safety and existence of the National Government, is the presence of an illiterate population prevailing largely in those Southern States. In the North no aid of the National Government is really needed anywhere. No bill would be introduced in Congress with the expectation of aiding the Northern States in educating their people, because it is not necessary. This is an immediate evil that affects not only the people of the South, but the people of the whole country—the evil of the remarkable illiteracy in all the Southern States.

Now, what is it that this bill seeks to aim at? It is to remove by gradual degrees the illiteracy of the people of the Southern States. As a matter of course the law must be made general in its terms; but the object aimed at is to enlighten this great mass of ignorance that is admitted to prevail in the Southern States. Ought not Congress when it votes this huge amount of money, amounting by this bill to one hundred and ten or one hundred and twenty million dollars——

Mr. BLAIR. One hundred and five million dollars in ten years.

Mr. SHERMAN. One hundred and five million dollars in ten years. Before it commences to appropriate this large sum of money Congress ought to see that the money is to be properly applied to remove the evil complained of; that is, illiteracy in the Southern States; but instead of that the bill proposes to turn over the money to the Southern States themselves. Well, sir, it is right that this money should be expended in the South. The General Government has no agency to carry on a school system in the Southern States.

Mr. BLAIR. Will it interrupt the Senator for me to state——

Mr. SHERMAN. I would rather that I should be allowed to go on. Look at the laws of the States, and see what would be the disposition of the money if the bill passes. I am told the laws of most of the Southern States are similar. I have here the general laws of South Carolina to show how they would distribute this money. I do not complain of the laws; I simply refer to this one that is now the existing law in the State of South Carolina. I believe similar laws are in many of the States in somewhat different language. In this law of 1882, the latest law, it is provided:

SEC. 1008. Each county board of examiners shall divide their county into convenient school districts for all purposes connected with the general interests of education, and redistrict the same whenever, in their judgment, the general good requires it. Every school district organized in pursuance of this chapter shall be a body-politic and corporate, &c.

I want to come to the provision in regard to the distribution. Section 1002 of the general statutes of South Carolina provides:

He shall—

Speaking of the county school commissioner—

annually, on the 1st day of February, or as soon as practicable thereafter, apportion the income of the county school fund among the several school districts of his county in proportion to the average number of pupils attending the free public schools in each district, and he shall certify such apportionment to the county treasurer.

Suppose $700,000 is apportioned to the State of South Carolina, will that be applied to educate the illiterate? Not at all. It will be apportioned according to the number of literates, if I may coin a word.

Mr. BLAIR. I think the Senator will allow me to interrupt him now?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. BLAIR. The bill provides explicitly in its terms, as a condition to their receiving any money the second year or any subsequent year, that the money received from the General Government shall be distributed without reference to race or color and in such a way as to equalize the school privileges of all the children throughout the several States where the expenditure is made; and if, under the operation of local laws, there is any discrimination, a natural consequence of the actual result, this money must be used in such a way as to equalize the actual school privileges of all the children throughout the State.

Mr. SHERMAN. That does not answer the point. This law makes no discrimination on account of race, color, or condition. Therefore the State of South Carolina does not affect in the slightest degree the general principles of the bill that is proposed.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator will permit me to say that if under the law he quotes there is no discrimination then there is no evil in the laws of South Carolina.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is not so either. There is no discrimination on account of race or color, but there is a discrimination which would give to those who are now being educated all the money.

Mr. BLAIR. Why, sir——

Mr. SHERMAN. Do not interrupt me.

Mr. BLAIR. I have no right to interrupt the Senator, of course, but we usually submit to interruption when we think there may be a misunderstanding.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will hear the Senator.

Mr. BLAIR. I will not decline the privilege of repeating what the Senator seems to have misunderstood the first time I made the explanation. He is making this point against this bill that the distribution to the several States will not be an equal distribution, and he is citing or purporting to cite from the laws of the State of South Carolina to show that there is discrimination or unfairness in the practical operation of those laws, and he goes on with the proposition that this bill adds to the evil, whereas the express terms of the bill provide that if there is an evil in the State of South Carolina or in any other State in the distribution of the school money, this money shall be so used as to equalize the privileges of all.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, Mr. President, I will go on and say again that this law of South Carolina, although it may not be in harmony with the object we desire to have, to provide for the education of the illiterate, yet makes no discrimination on account of race or color. It does not violate the terms of your bill. I complain that this bill does not carry out the idea we all have in view. What we want is to educate the illiterate, not to add to the fund for the education of those who go to school now.

I am told another thing (and there if I am wrong I appeal to the Senator from South Carolina to correct me), that under their system of common schools they have been mainly established in towns where the population is larger.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator is entirely mistaken.

Mr. SHERMAN. I take the correction; but I am told by those who are familiar with the matter that the fact is so; and I have the report of the superintendent of schools, in which he says expressly that on account of the deficiency of the fund the schools have been mainly established in the centers of population, and that they are gradually and rapidly extending them as much as they can to other parts. At present the only rule of apportionment of the money that is voted by the State of South Carolina is according to the number of children that go to school in the year preceding. That is the rule, and the apportionment, therefore, is made on that basis, and not on the basis of illiteracy. It seems to me that that is an unjust provision.

I might take up the laws of other States and show that if this bill passes the money will not under the terms of those laws reach the evil; it will not provide for the illiterate people of the South; it will only go to swell the fund now distributed and used for a different purpose.

Mr. President, I am in favor in the broadest terms of voting money from the national Treasury to educate the illiterate children of the South and of the North as well, because no discrimination should be made; but whenever that is done it ought to be upon certain principles, each of which, when I state it, I believe every Senator will concur in.

First, the United States should co-operate with the several States in educating the illiterate children of the United States. That is partially recognized in the bill pending in the House of Representatives and which has now been reported from a committee there, which contains the very amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana almost in the same words. Let me look at that bill. The bill reported to us only requires one-third of the amount that is appropriated by the National Government in any State to be expended by the State. That is, if $750,000 is given to a State only $250,000 need be expended by the State for general school purposes. In other words, the State is only bound to apportion one-third of the fund we appropriate or one-fourth of the whole aggregate. The bill reported in the House of Representatives goes upon a different principle. It provides—

> But no State, after the first appropriation under this act, shall receive under its provisions a greater sum than such State shall have expended during the previous year for like purposes of public instruction from moneys raised or appropriated in said year by State and local authority—

So that the House bill reported from the committee of the House contains the very provision offered by the Senator from Indiana which is now pending here as an amendment to this bill. This bill contains no such provision. It only requires one-third of the amount to be appropriated without any control whatever over the appropriation.

But that is not all. When this measure is adopted it ought to be founded upon some fundamental principles, the first, as I said, being that the United States should co-operate with the several States in educating the illiterate in the several States. That is admitted. Then I say that the disbursement of this fund should be made by the State. I have no doubt of that. As I said a moment ago, the National Government has no machinery to carry on a system of schools in the Southern States. We must therefore depend upon the States themselves to disburse the money. But here I differ with the Senator from Missouri entirely. The United States when it appropriates money selects an agent to disburse this money of its and may make conditions. If the United States have the right to appropriate the money, they have the right to say upon what conditions the money shall be expended. If they say we will aid the South or the Southern States to educate their illiterate children, then the United States have the power and the right to set out the principles and conditions or limitations of that grant. The greater includes the less; and if the power is given to make these appropriations at all, the power is also given to say for whose benefit the money shall be expended, how it shall be expended, where and when and how apportioned, and for what purposes. That is as clear a proposition as can be shown in Euclid or any other mathematical work.

I say, therefore, that if any money is appropriated by the United States it should be upon conditions that will insure the application of that fund to the impartial education of all classes of illiterate children. In my judgment this bill does not do it. This bill does not set out the conditions upon which this money shall be received and paid to the States. I believe Senators will agree with me that among these conditions there should be a contribution by the several States of a certain proportion of money to be expended by each State for the same purpose. That is attempted in this bill, but it is not so well guarded as in the House bill.

Second, I say that the allotment by the State among the several geographical portions of the State shall be according to the number of illiterate children in such portions of the State. As a matter of course, to add to the general fund of the State without making provision for the people that we desire to educate would be a very unwise provision; and therefore this bill whenever it passes should provide for the allotment or distribution of this fund among the several geographical divisions of each State in proportion to the illiterate children in those geographical divisions. Take the State of Alabama, which would get the benefit of an appropriation of $1,000,000 the first year under this bill. That money should be divided among the counties and townships of that State, so far as the census takes notice of geographical divisions, according to the illiterate people in the several divisions. In the southern belt of that State where the great mass of the colored people live more should be granted out of this general fund, because there are more illiterate children in proportion to the number of people in those counties, while in the northern counties, especially the manufacturing counties where manufacturing is springing up rapidly, the allotment should be less, just as in Ohio where we have only about 2 or 3 per cent. of illiterate people we do not expect to get any of this fund, but wherever illiterate people live the money ought to go into that region for the purpose of educating them, and the State should be so far controlled in the dispensation of the money as to see that that distribution is fairly made.

Third. Such control over the appropriation by the United States should be secured as will insure the fair and just application of the money so appropriated. Sir, when you authorize any officer of your Government to disburse public money, you state for what purpose it shall be disbursed; you control his discretion; he is simply the executive of your will; and if money is appropriated to these States, the States are the simple agents of the National Government to distribute, not their money, but the money of the General Government; and so far as this appropriation is made that money should be controlled in the principles of distribution and in the purposes of its expenditure by the bill itself, by the action of the General Government, and not be left to the States.

Fourth. The appropriation should be annually made like other appropriations, but upon a general policy clearly defined in the bill. There is no object for, in a bill of this kind, making permanent appropriations, as they are classed. You can not appropriate for the Army for over two years; and here you appropriate for an object for ten years, without knowing what the ten years will bring forth. If there is any principle of our Government well established in practice and that has been adhered to with great tenacity by the old Democratic party in former times, it was that the only safety for the Government was to have annual appropriations, so that each year the disbursement of the money should be brought under the eye of the legislative authority.

Mr. FARLEY. Is not that sound doctrine?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is, and that is what I say now.

Mr. BLAIR. The bill is amended in just that particular. It provides by a section that it may be repealed at any time.

Mr. SHERMAN. In other words, it requires the President and the Senate and the House to agree on a change of the policy. Why should not this appropriation stand like the appropriation for the salary of the President or the judges of the courts? We will not appropriate for two years in advance the salaries of the judges.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator will allow me to answer the question which he has put. The Senator must see and the country must understand that if this large appropriation for the immediate expansion and support of the common schools of a great section of the country is to be made at all, there must be a declaration of a permanent policy or a policy that is to be continued for some definite period of time. Otherwise what encouragement has a State to expend the first year's allotment in such a way as to lay the foundation of an establishment that may be starved to death by the failure of the appropriation the very next year? If the National Government is to pour into the Southern or any other States practically the same amount which they are now expending, or approaching the same proportion, to establish a system of schools, and there is no declaration of policy that it is likely to continue for any length of time, they may find that the second year there is a failure of that which they have relied upon, and the consequent prostration, demoralization, and destruction of the schools.

Mr. SHERMAN. On the same reasoning we should not refuse to make an appropriation for twenty years for the Supreme Court of the United States, because, forsooth, we may some year withhold appropriations to carry on that great department of the Government! Why is it that annual appropriations are provided for? Is it from a doubt that Congress will provide the necessary means to carry out an established policy? Not at all; but it is because each appropriation should be made annually, so that its expenditure may be constantly brought under the surveillance of the legislative power. Therefore we refuse to appropriate for any purpose for more than one year. It is easy to declare a policy. This bill may declare that it is the intention of the United States to aid and assist the several States in educating the illiterate people of the United States, and that is a sufficient declaration to justify a faith that it will be done; but the appropriation should not be made in advance for a series of years. We can not tell what may come this year or next year. We have no right to legislate for the future. We can only legislate for ourselves, and during the brief period for which we are selected as Senators and Representatives. Future legislation must depend on those who come after us. If a policy is declared in this bill to aid in the education of the children of the South, we must expect that those who follow us will be as patriotic and as wise as we are, and will, so far as the means of the Government will allow, make these annual appropriations from time to time.

This I do not regard as a fatal objection to the bill, but it is an objection that ought to make us pause, because it is in the face and in violation of established principles of the Government recognized by all political parties.

Now, Mr. President, I do not wish at all to comment upon this bill, but I will say that the House of Representatives have——

Mr. BLAIR. I must call the Senator to order. I myself have too often been reminded, and so have other Senators, I think, by the honorable Senator himself, that this sort of language is contrary to the rules of the Senate. He has already alluded to the contents of a bill pending before the House, and he escaped being called to order.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, Mr. President, there is nothing to prevent me from reading from any document that I choose to present here.

Mr. BLAIR. That may be possible, but I doubt that even. Certainly the Senator has no right to designate what it is for the purpose of influencing legislation at this end of the Capitol.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I find here in a paper before me some wise provisions to which I respectfully call the attention of my friend from New Hampshire, and he can find out where they come from.

Mr. BLAIR. I have read the instrument. The Senator does not need to read it for the information of his friend from New Hampshire.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I will read it for the information of others.

Mr. BLAIR. That may be.

Mr. SHERMAN. I was not so happy as to know that this existed until recently.

SEC. 3. That before any State shall be entitled to receive its share of said fund it shall have complied with the following conditions:

Here are conditions imposed upon the grant. I call the attention of my friend from Missouri to these conditions:

First. That it shall have provided by law, either general or local, for the free common-school education of all its children of school age, without distinction of color, for at least three months in each year, from the funds provided for schools under the laws of said State.

That is, it requires before they shall use our money that they shall show what they have done with their own money. That is stretching the State-rights doctrine a good deal, that they shall have done so and so by the laws of their own State, and shall show how they have expended the money.

Provided, That separate schools for white and colored children shall not be considered a distinction of color.

Second. That no part of said fund shall be expended, directly or indirectly, under any pretense whatever, for the purchase, erection, preservation, repair, or rent of any building or buildings, or for sites or lots for the location thereof, or in paying the salary of any public officer or other person not engaged in teaching.

Third. That it shall have caused to be made such reports to the Commissioner of Education concerning the condition of its schools, on or before the 1st day of August in each year, as said Commissioner of Education, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, shall deem desirable; and shall especially report for each county as follows—

Here is the information given by geographical divisions—

The number of public schools of every grade; the whole number of days actually taught in each during the year preceding—

And so on; a bill of minute directions as to what information the State shall furnish and as to what conditions it has complied with.

Fourth. That it shall have applied all moneys by it previously received under the provisions of this act in accordance therewith.

That seems to me a wise thing. What I am willing to do is to vote this year a general declaration of policy, that it is the purpose of the United States to aid and assist to the extent of its ability from time to time in the education of the illiterate classes of the whole United States upon the basis of illiteracy, if you please, and to appropriate a sum of money upon certain conditions well defined, even more carefully defined than in the paper that I have read to you. If those conditions seem to be just and right, I am willing to go as far as the farthest to remove this blight of illiteracy from our country wherever it exists. I recognize broadly the duty of the National Government; I think the safety of the National Government demands that we should remove this dark cloud of ignorance that rests upon a portion of the people of the States. Without reproaches to any section, without going into the past, I am willing as one of the Senators from Ohio—and we do not need any aid in support of our common schools; we appropriate over $7,000,000 annually in aid of education, besides aiding in maintaining a number of colleges and higher institutions—I am willing to vote from the National Treasury a large sum of money this year, and from time to time as long as the necessity exists a liberal sum of money, to aid in the education of the illiterate children of the Southern and Northern States. That will apply the law universally; but before doing so I wish a measure brought before us that contains wise and well-guarded restrictions—restrictions, if you please, upon the prejudice of the people among whom this money is to be distributed; restrictions, if you please, that will break down all barriers between the education of the whites and blacks, except only that I believe the principle of establishing separate schools is a wise one. So far as I know the colored people themselves are in favor of that provision wherever there are enough people in the community or within the school district to make the basis of separate schools. That is a matter of detail properly to be determined by each State.

In Ohio it was supposed, when this policy was adopted of breaking down the barriers against the blacks in our State—for we had black laws as well as you—that there would be difficulty in seeing the few blacks mingled with the whites at the common schools, but all that difficulty has passed away. It is true we have but 80,000 black people in a population of over 3,000,000, and therefore the condition of affairs in Ohio is not to be compared with the condition of affairs in the Southern States. I have no objection to any wise regulations in regard to this that may be deemed consistent with the state of feeling, the prejudices, if you please, of the States where these schools are to be established; but I wish no discrimination made as to the amount of money that is appropriated for black and white. I wish only to see this money fairly applied to the education of the illiterate, and not to add to the education of those who are already partly learned and have the facilities of education. That is all I desire; and with such amendments ingrafted on this bill, or, as I think, better, with a wise and careful revision of this bill by the committee having it in charge, I shall vote for it with great pleasure. As it stands now I can not consistently, with my ideas of what is prudent and wise legislation, vote for it.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I do not rise to make a speech on this bill at this hour in the evening; but I wish merely to point out what seems to me to be the error in two suggestions made by the Senator from Ohio while they are fresh in the mind of the Senate.

Mr. LAMAR. Will the Senator from Massachusetts give way for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. HOAR. I do not think I shall take three minutes, certainly not five; and I had a little rather say the particular thing I have to say now. The Senator from Ohio criticises this bill, approving, as I understand him, its general policy of apportioning this relief among the States in proportion to their illiteracy, because, he says, when the States get it they are not, by the bill, compelled to make the distribution in their counties or school districts or minor subdivisions upon the same theory; and he instances the law of the State of South Carolina, which distributes the expenditure from her school fund and her school-taxes among the different school districts in proportion to the children who attend school. So the honorable Senator from Ohio says that South Carolina distributes this money not in proportion to the illiteracy or the need of the particular school district, but rather in proportion to its education or want of such necessity. That is his criticism.

Well, now, Mr. President, the simple answer to that is that it would be utterly impossible for South Carolina or any other State to make a distribution upon any other principle than that of the number of children who are actually found attending the particular school.

Mr. SHERMAN. The number of children in the neighborhood.

Mr. HOAR. Why, Mr. President, suppose there are two school districts side by side, each containing a thousand children; the presumption is that all children who go to school are, to the extent to which they are instructed, illiterate when they begin. The child in the school district wherever the parent wants to send his child to school and the child in the school district where no parent wishes to send the child to school is at the beginning of his school age equally illiterate. There is no difference in the illiteracy of infancy or of early childhood; but the expense is to pay for educating those who go, and it can not be based on any other ground; and if you have got in one school district a thousand children, nine hundred of them going to school, and in the adjoining school district a thousand children, only one hundred of them going to school, you must, of course, expend nine times as much to teach the nine hundred as you do the one hundred, and there is no other possible or practical arrangement which could be made by South Carolina.

Now, this bill does provide, among the conditions of the contribution by the National Government, that the States shall afford as far as is possible equal privileges from this fund and from the fund for its own expenditure to all its children alike, so that in the illiterate school district every child is to have the chance which the State gives to such child in the school district where there are illiterates. It may be that it would be well where there are separate schools in various States to have an express provision, and I, as at present advised, would vote for it, as I hope every Senator on both sides of the Chamber would, that where the children separated by reason of race, each race shall have in proportion to its numbers of children attending school an equal share of the fund; and if that is not found already in sections to which I have adverted, I hope it will be put there.

The other point to which I wish to reply, without making such general argument as I have to make on the bill at this late hour in the evening, is the honorable Senator's objection growing out of the fact that this is a permanent appropriation running through a series of years. I do not understand it so; I understand it is an appropriation made now, this year and at this moment, on certain conditions, of $105,000,000, repealable at the will of Congress before it gets out of the Treasury and at any time; but from the necessity of the case, as it is upon conditions to be performed year by year in future in the States, not to be paid out for ten years.

Whatever phraseology may be used, it is just what you did with the Union Pacific Railroad. You provided that as fast as the builders of that road built twenty-five miles, or whatever was the unit of their building, they should have Government bonds to a certain amount from the Treasury. Whether it took that road three years or ten years to be built, the payment came as soon as the condition was performed, that bill like this being subject to the repealing power which Congress held in its hand; and for that bill, though I have not looked, I am quite sure my honorable friend from Ohio must have voted.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator will allow me.

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say that the difference is that that was a contract between a private corporation and the United States.

Mr. HOAR. Suppose it was; what is the difference in principle except a difference in favor of this bill? The Senator says that was a contract. Now, this is a contract to this extent, that it provides when the State has done something one year, the next year, that being in the past and secure, the State shall have a certain grant of money from the Treasury.

It has been said that it is not safe to trust these great Commonwealths who are to be the principal objects of this bounty; and if we were to take counsel from our resentments, from our recollections of past history, or of recent history, we might be a good deal impressed by that argument. But as I understand the scheme of this bill it does not trust anybody with anything, except possibly for the first year of its operation, if it does then. It simply declares as an encouragement to the State of South Carolina in the year 1885 to make an effort to improve her school system and increase her school grant that if she will make a grant of a certain amount, will satisfy the United States Government that she has made it and distributed it on certain principles, and will give us the statistical information which we want, which enables us to test the accuracy of her report, then she shall have a sum of money, just as we said to the Union Pacific Railroad Company, "build twenty-five miles of road and you shall have so much, and build twenty-five miles more and you shall have so much, and so on until you get to the Pacific coast."

These two conditions, the condition of the proper expenditure of the money last year and the condition of reporting the statistical tables, seem to be slight, but they, especially the last of them, are to my mind of the most important and grave character. It was that little thing by which Horace Mann revolutionized the educational system of New England, so that to-day the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, if I am not misled by my memory, spends more than fifteen times per capita what she spent fifty years ago for her school children, then as now leading the column of Commonwealths in the matter of school education. The towns of the State of Massachusetts were by law compelled to make returns showing the average school attendance and the condition of their schools, and there was not a town so sluggish or unambitious that when it appeared at or near the foot of the column there was not some citizen in that town public spirited enough to devote his life and his best energies to stirring up his neighbors. I do not think, with these statistics coming by State authority to the United States Government year by year, that there will be Senators from North Carolina making such speeches as we heard yesterday. That State will have something else to say, if she is the tail State among the thirty-eight of the American Commonwealths in the matter of her school children, than what her Senator told us on this floor yesterday.

Mr. COKE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After three minutes spent in executive session the doors were opened, and (at 5 o'clock and 33 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 25, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. GEORGE Z. GRAY, D. D., dean of the seminary, Cambridge, Mass.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of so much of the Journal as relates to the introduction of bills and joint resolutions be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

The remainder of the Journal was read and approved.

HISTORY OF STATE DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, recommending the purchase by the Government of the "Chronological History of the Department of State and the Foreign Relations of the Government from 1774 down to the present time," by John H. Haswell, Chief of the Bureau of Indexes and Archives of the Department of State, for the use of the heads of Departments, officers in the foreign service, and committees of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. BELFORD. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. DAVIDSON] states that he rises to a question of privilege.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Yesterday, on the joint resolution making an appropriation to prevent the overflow of the city of New Orleans, La., and the country adjacent thereto, I voted inadvertently, as I was paired with Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I was necessarily called away immediately after voting and was not present when the pairs were announced, otherwise I would then have withdrawn my vote. I ask to have my vote withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to have his vote withdrawn. If there be no objection, his request will be granted, and the Journal will be corrected accordingly.

There was no objection.

Mr. BENNETT. I rise to a question of privilege. When the yeas and nays were called on yesterday on the resolution making an appropriation to prevent the overflow of the city of New Orleans I was not in the House. I was absent attending a session of the Committee on Elections by permission of the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I have a communication from the Postmaster-General, addressed to me as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, which I think should be laid before the House through the regular channel and be printed by order of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the proper indorsement to be made on the communication and lay it before the House.

Mr. BELFORD. I withdraw the demand for the regular order.

NATIONAL BANK OF MIDDLETOWN, PA.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I ask unanimous consent to take from the House Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. 6021) to authorize the National Bank of Middletown, Pa., to change its location.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the National Bank of Middletown, now located in the borough of Middletown and State of Pennsylvania, is hereby authorized to change its location to the borough of Steelton, in said State. Whenever the stockholders representing two-thirds of the capital of said bank, at a meeting called for that purpose, determine to make such change, the president and cashier shall execute a certificate, under the corporate seal of the bank, specifying such determination, and shall cause the same to be recorded in the office of the Comptroller of the Currency, and thereupon such change of location shall be effected, and the operations of discount and deposit of said bank shall be carried on in the borough of Steelton.

SEC. 2. That nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as in any manner to release the said bank from any liability or affect any action or proceeding in law in which the said bank may be a party or interested; and when such change shall have been determined upon as aforesaid, notice thereof and of such change shall be published in two weekly papers in the county of Dauphin and said State, not less than four weeks.

SEC. 3. That whenever the location of said bank shall have been changed from the borough of Middletown to the borough of Steelton, in accordance with the first section of this act, its name shall be changed to the National Bank of Steelton, if the board of directors of said bank shall accept the new name by resolution of the board, and cause a copy of such resolution, duly authenticated, to be filed with the Comptroller of the Currency.

SEC. 4. That all debts, demands, liabilities, rights, privileges, and powers of the National Bank of Middletown shall devolve upon the National Bank of Steelton whenever such change of name is effected.

SEC. 5. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

The following amendment reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency was read:

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to authorize the National Bank of Middletown, Pa., to change its location and name."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BEACH. I am not disposed to object to the consideration of this bill, but I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether this change can not be effected under a general law?

Mr. ERMENTROUT. There is no general law in existence authorizing such change.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended as recommended by the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. ERMENTROUT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COLORADO SCHOOL LANDS.

Mr. BELFORD. I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill No. 74 be taken from the Speaker's table and considered at this time. It is a bill purely of local importance to my State, and immediate action upon it is desirable.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection to its present consideration.

The bill (S. 74) to enable the State of Colorado to take lands in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections found to be mineral lands, and to secure to the State of Colorado the benefit of the act of July 2, 1862, entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," was read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That an act entitled "An act to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," approved March 3, 1875, shall be construed as giving to the State of Colorado the right to select for school purposes other lands in lieu of such sixteenth and thirty-sixth section as may have been or shall be found to be mineral lands: Provided, That such selections shall be made from lands returned as agricultural, and upon which at the date of selection no valuable mineral discoveries have been made; and all such selections shall be reported to the Secretary of the Interior, who shall, if he is satisfied such lands so selected are not mineral, so certify, and thereupon the right of said State to such selected lands shall finally attach; and the Secretary of the Interior shall also ascertain whether any of such sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections are mineral lands, and shall certify their character, which certificate shall determine the matter.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the deputy surveyor, at the time of executing the survey of any township, to make a critical examination of the character of sections 16 and 36, and to embrace in his field-notes a full report of any and all mineral discoveries found to the surveyor-general, who shall report to the Secretary of the Interior whether the whole or any part of either of said sections is mineral in character.

SEC. 3. That the State of Colorado, in selecting lands for agricultural-college purposes under the acts of July 2, 1864, and July 23, 1866, may select an amount of land equal to 30,000 acres for each Senator and Representative which said State is entitled to in Congress, from any public land in said State not double-minimum-priced land, or selections may be made from said double-minimum lands, but in the latter case the lands are to be computed at the maximum price and the number of acres proportionally diminished; but no mineral lands shall be selected.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill which has just been read?

Mr. OATES. I would like to ask the gentleman from Colorado a question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] will be permitted to make a statement, the right to object to the consideration of the bill being reserved.

Mr. BELFORD. I would like to make a statement in reference to this bill.

Mr. OATES. I would like to ask the gentleman from Colorado a question.

Mr. BELFORD. Very well.

Mr. OATES. I desire to inquire if this bill is the same as a bill of similar title which has been considered by the Committee on Public Lands of this House?

Mr. BELFORD. It is exactly the same bill, considered by the Committee on Public Lands, and unanimously recommended for passage. This Senate bill passed that body unanimously.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to say to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD], reserving the right to object to the bill at the proper time, that when this bill was called up once before it was objected to by the gentleman from California [Mr. BUDD], I think.

Mr. BELFORD. Yes.

Mr. HOLMAN. That gentleman is not now in his seat. I suppose the ground of his objection was the fact that a bill of a similar character for the benefit of California had been severely criticised by the papers of that State.

Mr. BELFORD. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is mistaken.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman will not insist upon the consideration of this bill in the absence of the gentleman from California [Mr. BUDD], who objected to it before.

Mr. BELFORD. I want to say to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that I understand the gentleman from California [Mr. BUDD] has withdrawn his objection to this bill. If the House will permit me I would like to make a statement. Under the act of Congress so many sections of land were granted to my State for school purposes.

Mr. DIBRELL. There is no objection to the bill; let it be passed without taking up time for discussion.

Mr. BELFORD. Very well; if there is no objection I will ask that the vote be taken on the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill which has been read?

Mr. BROADHEAD. I object.

Mr. BELFORD. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. BROADHEAD. I want to know the nature of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the bill is not before the House.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. BROADHEAD said: I withdraw my objection to the present consideration of Senate bill No. 74.

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection to the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. If I understand correctly this bill has informally been considered by the Committee on Public Lands of this House.

Mr. BELFORD. Yes, and unanimously recommended.

Mr. BRENTS. A House bill exactly like this, word for word, has been considered and reported by the Committee on Public Lands with a favorable recommendation.

There being no further objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read three several times, and passed.

Mr. BELFORD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FRAUDULENTLY ASSUMING TO BE UNITED STATES OFFICERS.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent to report for consideration at this time from the Committee on the Judiciary the bill (H. R. 4993) making it a felony for a person to falsely and fraudulently assume or pretend to be an officer or employé acting under authority of the United States or any Department thereof, and prescribing a penalty therefor. The bill provides a penalty against certain banditti that are now prowling over the country and levying black-mail on pension claimants. It does not take a penny out of the Treasury, and there is an emergency for immediate action.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection to its present consideration.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That every person who, with intent to defraud either the United States or any person, falsely assumes or pretends to be an officer or employé acting under the authority of the United States, or any Department of the Government thereof, and who shall take upon himself to act as such, or who shall in such pretended character demand or obtain from any person or from the United States, or any Department of the Government thereof, any money, paper, document, or other valuable thing, shall be deemed guilty of felony, and shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000, or imprisonment not longer than three years, or both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? The Chair hears none.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PREVENTION OF COLLISIONS AT SEA.

Mr. DUNN. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the House Calender and put upon its passage House bill 5692, to adopt the "Revised International Regulations for preventing Collisions at Sea."

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which there will be opportunity to object.

Mr. DUNN. As the bill is somewhat lengthy, I desire to make a short statement before it is read.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, this bill contains nothing except the revised international regulations which have been accepted and agreed to by all the maritime nations of the world for the purpose of preventing collisions at sea. These regulations are now in fact the law of the sea. Our merchant marine and our Navy are both bound by them; and they have been made the statutory law of every maritime power on earth except the United States. So that we are in the attitude of having our entire merchant marine subject to that law without requiring them to know and understand it.

The bill contains nothing else than these revised regulations, which have been published by the English board of trade, and will go into effect on the 1st of next September. It is a matter of vital importance to our shipping interests that they should be made statutory in the United States for the protection of our merchant marine. They do not interfere with the regulations for preventing collisions on the inland waters of the United States. They are simply the result of diplomatic correspondence between our Government and other maritime powers of the world. Their details have all been settled, and are incorporated in this bill exactly as agreed upon by all the nations.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Does the bill come from a committee?

Mr. DUNN. It comes from the Committee on Commerce, and is a unanimous report from that committee. It is an exact copy of the regulations, as furnished by the British minister.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill, but was interrupted by Mr. BLACKBURN, who said: As this is a lengthy bill and contains nothing except a schedule of regulations, I ask that the further reading be dispensed with.

Mr. DUNN. Can that be done?

The SPEAKER. It can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. DUNN. I am more than willing. The bill contains nothing except the international regulations. There is not another syllable of legislation in it.

Mr. REAGAN. It comes to us from the Department, and has the unanimous approval of the Committee on Commerce. I do not think there can be any mistake if the House should adopt the measure without further reading.

Mr. DUNN. There can be no mistake.

Mr. COX, of New York. It has, I understand, the approval of all the maritime nations.

Mr. DUNN. It is the result of an international agreement.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask unanimous consent that the further reading be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] asks unanimous consent to dispense with the further reading of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I presume there is not much more of the bill; and it seems to me best that it should be read.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, but before it was concluded

Mr. ELLIS said: I object to the further reading of this bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. ELLIS. I will object to the consideration. It is too long and too important a measure to be passed in this way. I have no objection to its being printed in the RECORD for information.

Mr. DUNN. I do not care to have it printed in the RECORD; but its passage is a matter of public interest, and the gentleman's own city is largely interested.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw my request for the further reading of the bill. I understand it does not apply at all to the interior waters of the United States.

Mr. DUNN. It applies only to the high seas and the coasting trade. All the great commercial cities are concerned in it.

The SPEAKER. The bill is not before the House, unless the gentleman from Louisiana withdraws his objection.

Mr. ELLIS. I object, and demand the regular order.

Mr. DUNN. Of course the gentleman has a right to persist in his objection if he thinks that his city does not need this measure. But I want to assure him that his city is more interested in it than I am personally.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana objects to the present consideration of the bill, and demands the regular order. The bill is not before the House.

MORNING HOUR DISPENSED WITH.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. That will require a two-third vote.

Mr. DOWD. I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 123, noes 21.

So (two-thirds having voted in the affirmative) the morning hour was dispensed with.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced it insisted on its amendments to the bill (H. R. 6073) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House, and asked for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed Mr. ALLISON, Mr. HALE, and Mr. BECK as conferees on its part.

URGENCY DEFICIENCY BILL.

On motion of Mr. RANDALL, by unanimous consent, the message of the Senate was taken from the Speaker's table.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House insist upon its disagreements to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as managers of such conference on the part of the House Mr. RANDALL, Mr. BURNES, and Mr. CALKINS.

POST-OFFICE DEFICIENCY BILL.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, asking for an appropriation to supply deficiency in the appropriation for the service of the office of the Postmaster-General for the current fiscal year; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PAYMENT OF TAX ON DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of revenue bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (Mr. DORSHEIMER in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5265) to extend the time for the payment of the tax on distilled spirits now in warehouse.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Chairman, I desire briefly to state the reasons why I shall support this bill. My first impressions in regard to it were the same as those stated by the honorable gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE]; my first impressions were against the bill. It was a whisky bill, a whisky-extension bill, and my first impulse was, as I think it was with the majority of the House, that it was unwise to grant such an extension. But, sir, I have examined with all the care and wisdom of which I am able to examine any measure, and I have come to the conclusion that my duty on this floor requires me to vote for it.

Now, sir, what is the bill before the House? It is a bill to extend the time for paying the tax to this Government upon an American manufacture, a manufacture as legitimate and as authorized as any other in this country.

It is to extend the time for paying the tax, which in my judgment, after the best examination I have been able to bestow upon it, is now collected partially and not in a manner in which taxes upon American manufactures ought to be collected.

The power of taxation under our Government is coextensive with the subjects in reference to which we have a right to legislate To carry out the duties of this Government we were clothed with the most ample power to lay taxes. Beyond that we have no right to go under our General Government. A tax upon production, a tax laid on the manufacture and not upon consumption, is a local and partial tax. It is a tax discriminating against the article taxed, and in my judgment is not in accordance with the system of government under which we live. Our taxes should be equal; they should be impartial. Impartiality is an organic, an innate law of our national administration. This is a Governmentnot for one State, but for the people of all the States. Taxes should be laid equally, and they should be so laid and so collected that they will operate equally, or as near so as may be, upon all the population of the country.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a tax laid upon the consumption of this article is a tax which operates with substantial equality on the whole population, while a tax upon the production of the article is a tax laid upon a small portion of the people of the country and upon a small part of the States of this Union. I am constrained to the conviction this tax ought never to have been laid except in a great emergency otherwise than upon the consumption of the country.

If I am right in this, why should we deal with this article otherwise than we would deal with grain from which it is made? Why should we deal with this article otherwise than we would deal with coffee, if that were the subject of consideration? It seems to me, sir, it should be dealt with precisely as we would deal with the grain from which the article is made; that is, if it is to have a tax levied on it, and I believe it should have a tax as much as it will bear and as long as it will bear it and will yield the best results to the country. I would tax it so as to produce for the Government a continuous and certain income so long as it shall need such an income.

But, sir, I would levy that tax in a way so it should fall on the whole population of the country, and not on particular States or special sections of the country or upon particular individuals. I would levy it on the whole population of the country for the benefit of the whole.

As I understand the law which this proposes temporarily to modify, it is provided that after the term of three years this article is to pay the tax or excise. I believe that this term was selected for the reason that it was the substantial opinion of Congress that the tax should be exacted upon the consumption.

It seems to me that the term itself indicates clearly that it was and is the judgment of Congress that this tax should be so laid as to be a tax upon consumption solely. It has so happened that there has been an overproduction in this line of business. The production has grown in excess of the demands of the market; and in order to make this a tax upon consumption, in order to bring it within the principles of the Constitution, which I recognize as governing the whole system of taxation, the time needs to be so far extended that it shall become a tax upon consumption, and that, being such a tax, it shall be distributed equally and substantially in proportion to the population of the country.

In granting this extension it has been said by way of argument in opposition to this bill that it will be special legislation. If this tax as now provided be enforced otherwise than as a tax upon consumption, it does not need to be repeated in your hearing that it is so levied and so collected as a special discrimination, a special legislation against this single article of manufacture and against the capital engaged in this business. So far as this bill proposes to go it will restore the true principle of taxation, and it will do no more than to bring this article within the rule which we have adopted for all of the other items which enter into our great American manufacturing business. It seems to me that from the facts already stated in this discussion it can not be denied that there exist the strongest reasons possible why the manufacturers of this particular article shall have the right to claim this extension at our hands.

I do not claim, Mr. Chairman, that these manufacturers have done more than their legitimate share. I do not claim that they are more worthy for having contributed to the support of the Government and the support of the country in its time of need than others; but, sir, they are entitled with all of the others to equal consideration, and I trust that we shall give it to them by this bill.

Now, sir, is there anything in the condition of the country which prevents our granting this extension? If there is anything so that we can not give the relief which is requested in this particular instance and give it in justice to the whole country, or if the giving of it will embarrass the country, if it will embarrass the Treasury, if it will embarrass or hamper any of the operations of the Government, then if those facts are ascertained or established there may be reason why we should hesitate. But, sir, the reasons are all the other way.

The condition of the Treasury is such that we are embarrassed absolutely with the amount of money now on our hands which is needed in the avocations, the activities, and the industries of life. We can grant this extension not only without inconvenience to the country, but to the greatest convenience and advantage of the country in a financial point of view. And here I wish to say, sir, a word in this connection. I want to call the attention of this committee to the fact that if this money is demanded from these people, if we insist upon the payment of this tax, and require that this money shall go into the Treasury at this time, we have no possible way left in which we can dispose of it except to apply it to the payment of the national debt and to that portion of it that is now due. We have no other use for it. The Treasury can do nothing else with it under the law except to apply it to the liquidation of that portion of the national debt which is now due and payable. And what is that debt and what is the condition of it?

On the 19th day of this month the amount of bonds of this Government now due and payable was $266,024,750. Of this amount of bonds, considerably more than two-thirds, to wit, $184,302,350, are the basis of the national banking system of the country and the security for their circulation. They represent the very foundation and the stability of the business of this country. If this money is received from the tax on distilled spirits it must inevitably be paid out and undermine and destroy to a certain extent the national banking system upon which rests, more than upon any other present instrumentality, the stability and prosperity of the business of the country. The insisting upon the payment of this tax will bring during the next year a very large amount of money into the National Treasury. Between this and August next $30,000,000 must be paid in. During the next year, that is to say from November until the succeeding December of 1885, seventy millions more must be paid. That money, sir, every dollar of it, must be used under the law to pay the 3 per cent. bonds of this country. It must, every dollar of it, be used to undermine and unsettle and destroy for the time being the basis upon which the banking system of the country rests. There is no other resource for these banks if this policy is pursued except to go into the market and pay the brokers' price and pay the demands of those who own the long-time bonds; and these run for the seven-year bonds now to 114, and those that run for twenty-three years to 125 and upwards.

Are we prepared, for the purpose of insisting upon the payment of this tax at this time when we do not want it, to undermine and destroy the banking system of the country to that extent and bring disturbance and disaster upon the country which will unavoidably ensue? Now, sir, I do not think the telegrams which have been laid before us from more than seventy of the national banks throughout the country are sent here without a broad understanding of this problem. They know, sir, that the exacting of this tax at this time means to that extent compulsion upon them to surrender their bonds and go into the market and buy at the enormous premium of $1.25 or upwards other bonds to take their place.

Why shall we do it, then? Why shall we thus inflict upon the country disturbance and disaster for the sake of insisting upon the very letter of this bond as to time when that time itself was granted for the purpose of making this tax operate equally, and it has been shown that to enforce it would defeat the very object of the term originally given to it?

But it has been said here that the extension of this tax will be an especial favor to these manufacturers. I have already said in my judgment the controlling advantages are overwhelmingly on the side of the Government and not of these manufacturers. It is not asked that this money shall remain in the Treasury idle. It is not asked that the Government shall make any loss or incur any possibility of a loss by this extension. This bill proposes that every dollar of the money involved shall pay into the Treasury of the United States not the pittance which we can make by disturbing and destroying the banking system of the country at present, but shall pay more than twice that interest. The bonds to which I have alluded bear but 3 per cent. interest. They return in taxation upon their circulation, more than two-thirds of them, nine-tenths of 1 per cent. interest upon all those held by the national banks, and deposit with the Government. The Government can realize but 2.10 per cent. interest by the payment of those bonds. Upon the balance they will realize 3 per cent. of stop interest at 3 per cent. The average interest they will stop is much less, is about 2.41; and that is all the Government can possibly realize by thus disturbing its currency and its business and breaking up these manufacturers and a large number of banks that are very likely to be broken up in consequence.

Shall we for the sake of realizing 2.10 per cent. interest refuse to accept the absolute security and certainty of 4½ per cent. interest upon the same amount? And have we not in that saving for the Government, have we not in that security to our continuous prosperity which this extension will grant, not only the most abundant justification, but are we not called upon as statesmen looking to the welfare of the country, to the stability of its business, to its future and immediate prosperity—are we not called upon to forbear to insist upon this breaking up the currency of the country for the sake of saving 2.10 per cent. interest when we can leave the same amount at interest at 4½ per cent.?

Mr. PUSEY. Will the gentleman from New York permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. POTTER. I would rather that the gentleman should wait till I get through. I will be through very soon, and the gentleman can then have all the time he wants.

After we have paid the $255,000,000 of 3 per cent. bonds which the Government now owes there is not another dollar of the public debt which can be reached for payment for seven and a half years. During that time the Government will be compelled to go into the market and among the brokers of the country and buy up, by taxation upon the people, the public debt of the country, at whatever price shall be demanded.

We can not retain the surplus in our Treasury. It must leave the Treasury and go out among the people. There is no possible way in which that can be done, if the legislation of the country remains as it is at present, except by going into the market for four or five years at least and buying up the debt of the country at whatever premium it shall demand.

Now, sir, if this money remains for two years where it is, paying 4½ per cent. to the Government, we shall be able to leave so much longer our 3 per cent. bonds, so that they will bridge over the time between that and the maturity of the 4½ per cent. bonds, seven and one-half years hence. If we get no other relief than that it will be considerable relief, and we shall owe it, sir, to this bill. And I care not whether it were whisky or coffee or anything else, if there is any interest in the country that can afford this relief and this security against danger during the next seven and one-half years and afford this great saving in the payment of our public debt, we ought to embrace it. In this view of it there is no whisky in this bill. It is a bill for the honest relief of a portion of the manufacturers of the country, and in granting this relief we shall benefit and secure every substantial interest of the country.

To my mind, sir, it is a question whether we will affirmatively by legislation here when there is a plain and open opportunity to do otherwise—whether we will precipitate this disturbance of our currency and of business upon the country.

Now, sir, there are other views that might be taken of this question that are conclusive to my mind. But this one is so controlling, so constrains my judgment, that I can not possibly refuse to vote for this bill.

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON].

Mr. BLACKBURN. How much of the hour is left?

The CHAIRMAN. Six minutes.

Mr. BLACKBURN. As the gentleman from New York has left only six minutes of the hour, it is scarcely sufficient for another speech on this side. I ask, therefore, that I may be permitted to reserve those six minutes, and let the gentleman who comes next on the other side take his hour now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] is recognized.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me a long time since I last addressed the House in current debate. How well I may, in my enfeebled condition, be able to sustain my train of thought and make myself heard I can not say. I have, however, a few deliberate and earnest convicions on the subject under consideration to which I hope to be able to give expression. Should my strength fail before I have said what I wish to say, I now ask for the privilege of filling up the reporter's skeleton at my leisure.

I think the demand of the table whisky syndicate for temporary relief from taxation, so that the public shall believe they are paying 90 cents a gallon tax to the Government, with interest, while they will be doing nothing else than paying 4½ per cent. interest on accruing taxes, is rather an impudent one.

The internal taxes on spirits, malt liquors, and tobacco in its several forms are maintained at great cost to the laboring people, the small farmers, the men of small capital, who working their own little farms or their own smaller orchards or who with their skill as cigar-makers should receive, as they did before these taxes were imposed, the wages which are now divided between them and the privileged capitalists who are licensed to employ them. And, sir, I affirm that these oppressive taxes are maintained for the benefit alone of three small syndicates, who under the influence of the laws enacted to secure their collection have acquired the monopoly of the American market for their respective productions.

Of those three branches of industry the manufacture and maturing of table whiskies is the chief; and those engaged in this pursuit constitute the chief of the syndicates who find in these taxes a sure guarantee of their monopoly of our home markets. The large manufacturers of tobacco, comparatively few in number, but who have crowded out the cigar-makers to whom I alluded and other small manufacturers, appear as the second syndicate with a protected monopoly. During the last Congress it was my privilege to promote the passage of a bill which, though it did not overthrow this monopoly, reduced the syndicate's guaranteed perquisites by one-half. By the operation of that bill they were, after a twenty years' struggle, compelled to allow the American farmer who raises tobacco to sell one hundred pounds of the yield of his fields and his labor to a purchaser other than one licensed by the Government to deal in leaf-tobacco. The other of these privileged syndicates is that of the manufacturers of malt liquors. For the benefit of these three syndicates we maintain these taxes, and in defense of their privileges we harry wide sections of our country. The service requires an army of over 4,000 men, whose principal employment is, as I shall abundantly prove, the persecution of small farmers and fruit-growers of the South. The direct annual expenditure required to maintain this army is over $5,000,000, and the indirect expenditure is said, and I believe truly, to amount to largely more than two and a half millions in addition. These are but some items of the cost of maintaining a system of taxation in support of private monopolies which Thomas Jefferson denounced as an infernal system that should never have been admitted into the Constitution.

But, Mr. Chairman, it may be asserted that we maintain these taxes for the benefit of the Government. I deny the proposition against all comers. The Government does not need any of the money derived from these oppressive exactions. The eloquent gentleman from New York, who has just taken his seat [Mr. POTTER], has told us that if we do not arrest their collection they will derange our whole commercial system and overthrow the national banking system, which I pronounce to be the best system of corporate banking the world has ever seen.

I had intended to dwell at some length on this point, but the gentleman made it so clear that I prefer to quote his words, as follows:

> Now, sir, is there anything in the condition of the country which prevents our granting this extension? If there is anything so that we can not give the relief which is requested in this particular instance, and give it in justice to the whole country, or if the giving of it will embarrass the country, if it will embarrass the Treasury, if it will embarrass or hamper any of the operations of the Government, then if those facts are ascertained or established there may be reason why we should hesitate. Every word here quoted is true as Holy Writ; yet the gentleman, with that severe logic and charming consistency which sometimes characterize the conclusions of those who properly appreciate the sacredness of party edicts, does not demand the repeal of these dangerous sources of revenue. No; he will be content with the postponement of the collection of the whisky tax for two years. I can not halt with so lame and impotent a conclusion. I oppose this bill, and demand the repeal of all internal taxes. Let us wipe them all from the statute-book and get rid of the infernal system.

I do not denounce the excise system as an infernal one on the authority of Mr. Jefferson alone. English history abounds in such denunciation, and here are statements made before the Committee on Ways and Means on the 28th of February by Messrs. DIBRELL, CALDWELL, and MCMILLIN, of Tennessee; BENNETT, SCALES, and COX, of North Carolina; Mr. CANDLER, of Georgia, and Mr. CABELL, of Virginia, together with those of Senators VANCE of North Carolina, and BROWN of Georgia, each one of which justifies the use of the harsh epithet. If these ten Members and Senators, all of whom speak from personal observation, have in their statements come within shooting distance of moderation, they have abundantly proven that our internal-tax system, as administered in their respective States, is in truth and in fact an infernal system, which, in its practical operations, is a disgrace to the age and the country. I shall recur to these statements and make extracts from each of them.

In November, 1881, I portrayed to a popular convention in New York, as well as my limited knowledge of the special facts would permit, the hardships with which these laws are administered and the depressing effect the taxes produce upon many branches of trade. It is not easy to make even intelligent men understand the effect on general industry of this spirit tax, which is at the rate, fixed by statute, of 90 cents a peck on corn and of $1.78 per gallon on alcohol. Think of it; a tax of 90 cents imposed on a peck of corn, when the farmer who raised it, his neighbor or his customer, attempts to advance it one degree in manufacture.

Let it be understood that I am not now speaking of table whisky, to which subject I shall come directly, but of alcohol, which is nature's solvent and therefore a vital agent in many of our productive industries, which enters largely into the arts; which makes the chief ingredient in bulk of the contents of nine out of every ten liquid compounds exposed for sale in the store of the druggist and pharmacopolist; which in fact enters into almost every branch of art and industry, and which by reason of this needless taxation adds largely to the cost of many articles that are of daily consumption by our laboring classes.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] who presses this bill with so much earnestness told us the other day that the high-wine distillers had an equal interest in this bill with the distillers of table whiskies. I do not know that I was ever in a distillery, but I deny his proposition, and vouch all nature as my witness. High wines and alcohol do not improve with age; no man skilled in the business as distiller, rectifier, or dealer will aver that the lapse of time improves their quality. That their spirit is evanescent and freely evaporates is notorious; and every pint, quart, or gallon of evaporation that occurs is so much irretrievable loss to the owner, without the golden compensation given for evaporation to owners of table whiskies, to which age adds tenfold compensation for the loss in quantity by evaporation.

The gentleman from Kentucky also assured us that failure to relieve these table whiskies would shock the commerce and finances of the country by the depreciation in the price of corn that would inevitably ensue. Now, Mr. Chairman, you are not probably familiar with such things as bourbon and rye whiskies or other beverages that heat the blood and excite the brain. Therefore, let me tell you that there are two kinds of whisky; one of them is bourbon, which is distilled from corn. The other is a distillation from rye, and is consequently known as rye whisky. The gentleman's prediction of so dire a calamity challenges an appeal to statistics and arithmetic.

Rye is the prevalent table whisky. The quantity of corn, or bourbon, whisky distilled each year is relatively very small; and a tornado that should in September sweep a hundred-acre Bourbon County corn-field would have as great an effect on the price of corn as the entire suspension of the distillation of bourbon whisky for a year. The effect of neither would be perceptible on the market.

Mr. Chairman, there is an infant industry, the existence of which is scarcely known to the people of this country and which the champions of the internal-tax system have been very anxious to suppress, which will consume more corn this year than distillers of bourbon whisky ever consumed in a year. When I and others have said to these gentlemen, "We are collecting too much money," some of the most outspoken of them have replied, "Well, repeal the duties on sugar and molasses, and there will be a vacuum into which the proceeds of the internal taxes can flow." Now, let us, while under the influence of the grave prediction of the gentleman from Kentucky, consider how relatively terrible would be the effect on the corn market if we should abolish the duties on sugar and strangle in its infancy the most growing of our modern manufactures, that of corn sugar. Why, my friend from Kentucky will hardly believe that in 1882 twenty-one corn-sugar factories consumed nearly 20,000,000 bushels of corn, considerably more than bourbon whisky consumed in the same year. This product is said to have more than doubled since that year. The capital then invested in the twenty-one establishments was $6,500,000. The number of laborers employed was 3,000; the number of bushels of corn consumed that year was 19,500,000; the value of other material used, $1,000,000; total wages paid, $1,300,000; the total production of sugar, 67,200,000 pounds; the total production of molasses, 32,900,000 gallons. Now observe; these statistics of an infant industry refer to a period two years back.

Sir, as between the table-whisky syndicate, or any of the monopolies our internal taxes foster, and the corn, sorghum, or cane-growing farmer, I am for the farmer all the time; and I want to get rid of these internal taxes, that we may maintain existing duties on sugar, and thus stimulate the diversification of our agricultural products and supply our market with sugar from our own fields and mills.

But gentlemen inquire, would you make whisky free? No, sir. I would rigidly regulate the sale and use of all intoxicants. The United States Government can not do this; it can only tax, and tax blindly. States, on the other hand, can regulate, can supervise, can restrict, can prohibit. States, through municipal governments, can, as is done in the young State of Nebraska and elsewhere in the West, by their ordinary police regulations, supervise the traffic and check or punish the vices excessive use engenders. And if crime and poverty are, as I believe them to be, the consequences of intemperance, then in God's name give not to the syndicate of table-whisky distillers but to the municipalities who try and punish criminals, who shelter and care for inebriates in their age and decrepitude, or worse, in their poor infantile orphanage, the victims of inebriety in the persons of their parents. Let us put with the penalties we inflict by legalizing the use of intoxicating beverages the small measure of financial relief to overtaxed municipalities, that they may be able to draw from this source.

But for the able speech of the gentleman from New York, from which I have made a liberal quotation, I would have argued more fully the question whether the Government needs any of the proceeds of these taxes. I pause now simply to say that without one dollar derived from internal taxes this year it will have sufficient revenue to meet every legitimate demand. We can not, however, pledge Congress to appropriate $40,000,000 for the improvement of one stream and begin with five or seven millions for one canal and two or three millions for another; nor can we appropriate a sum of $15,000,000, to continue at the diminishing rate of $1,000,000 per year, to be expended some time, somewhere, by somebody, in mitigation of national illiteracy; we can not do all this; but, sir, it will be a healthy day for our country when the Representatives of the people shall determine that the time has come for reducing the expenditures within their just constitutional limits. Let us, therefore, determine to relieve and inspire with faith in the Government and hope for the future the small farmers of the South by repealing what never was a popular system of taxation in any country, what was resisted by rebellion and attempted revolution when first resorted to in this country, what was repealed at the end of four years when re-established as war taxes in 1813, and what has now outlived its usefulness, and through the harshness of its administration has, as I have already said, become a disgrace to our country and age.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIS. Do I understand you to say you are ready to-day to abolish this system and give up this $50,000,000 of tax to the distillers who now owe it?

Mr. KELLEY. I say to the gentleman that if he has heard my language, as I know he did, any time in the last eighteen months on this subject, and understood it, as I believe he did, he must know that I am in favor of abolishing all these taxes and granting a rebate on unbroken packages. That is the point on which I stand and have stood for years. Get rid of the infernal system.

Sir, I said that I should appeal to the statements of the Members and Senators I named. I shall content myself with quoting enough from each of them to show that each of them has given me warrant for the harshest language I have applied to these laws and the manner of their administration in those portions of our country which these gentlemen represent.

The first of them who appeared before the committee was Mr. DIBRELL, of Tennessee. He said:

He had introduced a bill, which had been referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, in favor of abolishing the internal-revenue system. He had also introduced another bill to take off the tax from brandy manufactured from fruit. The removal of that tax would be a great advantage to farmers and fruit-growers. Those men who had small farms and orchards would then be able to get the benefit of their fruit products. If the whole internal-revenue taxation were removed then Congress and the people would know exactly what they were doing and how much the revenue would be reduced. Congress would then know how to deal with the bill introduced by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means taking 20 per cent. off the tariff duties. As it was, the question was left all in doubt. He was in favor of taking the taxes off tobacco and fruit brandy if the internal-revenue laws were not entirely repealed; and he thought that the removal of the taxation from tobacco and fruit brandy would reduce the revenue about $26,000,000 a year.

The report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for last year showed that the amount of revenue derived from tax on fruit brandy was $1,127,950. For the first seven months of the present fiscal year the revenue derived from that source was only $716,461, and that period embraced the months of July, August, and September, the best fruit-growing months in the year. At that rate the revenue from the taxation on fruit brandy would be less than three-fourths of what it had been in the previous fiscal year. It was a great burden to the farmers to be harassed and annoyed by revenue officers running through the country and watching every man who made a little brandy from his fruit. The trouble about the internal-revenue system was the manner of its collection. In that respect it was the most odious law that had ever been executed in his section of the country. The cost of collection was also very large. Last year the salaries paid to internal-revenue officers amounted to $5,113,000. The cost of miscellaneous expenses was $49,875, and the expense of revenue agents was $127,394. That made the expense of collecting the internal revenue amount to about $5,300,000. Besides that, there were the expenses of deputy marshals, United States commissioners, witnesses, spies, and district attorneys, all of which added together, he thought, would make the expenses of collecting the internal revenue at least $10,000,000.

The number of suits that were begun in the year 1883 for violation of internal-revenue laws was 4,558. He wanted the committee to think about the impolicy of having on the statute-book a law which harassed and annoyed citizens as this law did. The number of judgments wherein the costs were not paid by the United States was 2,137. The number of judgments against the United States was 655.

If these suits did not cost the Government large sums, they did cost individuals very heavily. Every one of them must have cost, on the average, $50; and the defendants in these cases were usually a very poor class of men. He thought it wrong that Congress would keep on the statute-book a law so harassing to poor citizens. It might be said that men ought not to violate the internal-revenue laws. That was true. He admitted it. But men did violate them.

On the second Monday in July last there were in attendance on the Federal court held in Knoxville three hundred and twenty-five witnesses on the part of the Government and one hundred and fifty defendants in internal-revenue suits. A large majority of the cases were against men for selling patent medicines, such as Jerome's Rye Tonic and Hostetter's Bitters, without having a license to sell liquor, but Judge Key directed the grand jury not to find indictments in those cases, and he dismissed them all.

He had received a letter from Judge Key asking that the law be repealed. In this letter the judge said:

"Is there any hope for the repeal of the internal-revenue law? In this State these laws have become the means by which a very large number of disreputable people live, by making themselves spies, witnesses, guards, &c., at the public expense. Men too lazy to work manage to live at the expense of the Government."

He had another letter from Judge Baxter on the same subject, favoring the repeal of the internal-revenue law. In that letter Judge Baxter said:

"The public service for the United States is, I regret to say, in very bad hands in a majority of cases in Tennessee, and it can never be corrected until it is actively disfavored by the authorities at Washington."

Gentlemen will observe that Mr. DIBRELL estimates the cost, direct and indirect, to the Government and people of collecting the taxes on spirits, malt liquors, and tobacco at $10,000,000 per annum. In view of the facts he presents I do not regard his estimate as exaggerated. And, Mr. Chairman, I respectfully submit that Congress has no right to insist upon the annual expenditure of so large a sum in support of those trade monopolies. It would be wiser and more patriotic to repeal the taxes and emancipate the working people by thus abolishing the monopolies that oppress and plunder them.

Let me, in passing, and while it occurs to me, say, in support of one of Mr. DIBRELL's propositions, that when you repeal internal taxes you can calculate exactly the effect of your action; you can say that the bill will reduce the excessive revenues so much in the year. But when you reduce the rate of custom duties no man can say whether you will increase the current revenues or reduce them. It is our experience that increase of revenue has always followed, as an immediate effect, a reduction of duties; but after the lapse of a few years, when our markets had been flooded with cheap and inferior foreign goods, and our working people have lost employment and wages, and consequently the power to consume, the revenues rapidly decrease. What we now want is to reduce our revenues on the instant if it were possible. To attain this desirable result there is but one certain method. It can not be done by tariff tinkering and horizontal or other fanciful but impracticable reduction of existing rates of custom duties; the only method by which the result can possibly be attained is by the repeal of internal taxes. But I hasten to lay before you the promised extracts from the statements of the Members and Senators who appeared before the Committee of Ways and Means.

Senator VANCE, of North Carolina, followed Mr. DIBRELL. Among other things the Senator said:

The people of my State are not unwilling to pay these taxes; but they do object most strenuously to the manner in which they are levied and collected. That is a burden which creates more dissatisfaction and discontent and more actual distress among the people of my State than any other tax whatever. Therefore I am prepared, if the opportunity be afforded me, to vote for an absolute repeal of the whole internal-revenue tax system as it now stands; and if some other and better and more convenient way can not be adopted for collecting it I am opposed to ever reinstituting that tax. But if a method less obnoxious can be adopted I for one am willing to see the tax on whisky and tobacco retained.

I know the difficulty of convincing members of the committee of the evils and aggravations under which we suffer in North Carolina, because in most of the States from which the gentlemen of this committee come the business of distillation is in the hands of large capitalists and is conducted in large establishments. There the tax is collected without any annoyance or trouble to the community at large. It is collected from men who live by that business, who make their money by it. There one officer (storekeeper or gauger, is competent to attend to a distillery that will produce 1,000 gallons a day, just as well as that same officer is required to attend to a small distillery in the mountains of North Carolina which would produce only 8 gallons a day. There are in the State of North Carolina 1,617 small distilleries, and of that number there are only 6 that can produce more than 20 gallons a day. Of the whole number there are between 400 and 500 grain distilleries and some 1,200 fruit distilleries of a very limited capacity, none of them, I suppose, over 10 gallons a day.

These distilleries are all owned and operated by small farmers. Their fruit is the product of their orchards, so there is no speculation whatever in the business, nor can there be, in the nature of things, because an orchard can not be planted one day and the apples gathered from it the next day. It is a matter of years to secure an orchard, and the profit is dependent upon the season. For two out of three years perhaps we have no peach crop at all, at least none sufficient for distillation purposes, and not more than every other year do we have an apple crop, so that it is a small matter and circumscribed, in the nature of things. If the tax on the distillation of brandy were repealed, that business could not interfere in any way with the distillation of grain by the great distilleries that supply the traffic in this country. The fruit distillation can not be made to compete with it.

In addition to all this I beg leave to say (I do not know how it affects some members of this committee) that the presence of from 1,500 to 2,000 revenue officers, excisemen, going about through the country as spies upon every man who may be supposed to be a distiller, nosing into his private premises, and examining his domicile, is a nuisance and an annoyance to which a free people ought not to be subjected.

* * * * * * *

These officers, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, are privileged to go armed, and, like all men clothed with a little brief authority, their reign in my country and their conduct is turbulent, insolent, and overbearing. If a citizen is outraged by one of them beyond the point of endurance, and makes the least resistance, he is instantly shot down, and instead of his murderer being tried in the State courts for murder, as any other person would be tried, the case is transferred to the Federal court, and, as a general rule, the jury is packed and the officer is acquitted. We have had any number of instances of that kind. I could enumerate several horrible murders that have been committed in my State in this way, the perpetrators of which have not been tried in one of the State courts, and I can not enumerate a single case wherein the perpetrators have been punished—not one. I know one well-authenticated case in which a man was indicted in Ashe County, North Carolina, for an indecent assault and attempt to commit an outrage upon a young lady. He filed his affidavit with the clerk of the court, in which he swore that he was in the discharge of his official duty when the offense was committed. His case was, therefore, transferred prima facie to the Federal court; but the judge of the Federal court indignantly and immediately remanded it to the State court. I suppose he was not able to extract any construction from the statutes of the United States under which the officer would be authorized to attempt a crime of that kind.

In every view of the case, looking at it as a simple matter of justice on the part of the Government toward its citizens, especially toward its poor citizens, its farmers; looking at it in the light of the duty of the Government to make its people contented in regard to their taxes; looking at it in the light of the duty of the Government to avoid violating what we consider the muniments of liberty (entering a man's house and subjecting him to indignities under the suspicion that he is violating the law)—all these things I think require a modification of the system, and I hope that this committee will take that view of the matter and do something for the relief of the people.

Senator VANCE was followed by Mr. BENNETT, of North Carolina, who opened his remarks with the following allusions to the excise or internal-tax system:

Before proceeding to discuss the existing state of the law for the collection of internal revenue I desire to give the system a kick. Dr. Johnson defines excise as a hateful tax levied on commodities, adjusted not by common justice but by wretches hired by those to whom excise is paid.

Excise laws when first introduced into England in 1733 were denounced in the strongest language by the friends of popular government. Pulteney spoke of excise as a monster, a plan of arbitrary government. Another authority declared it to be such a scheme as could not, even by malice itself, be represented to be worse than it really is. Blackstone, in the first volume of his valuable Commentaries, page 378, says that "it has some advantages; but at the same time the rigor and arbitrary proceeding of excise laws seem hardly compatible with the temper of a free people. It is necessary to give the officer power of entering and searching the houses of such as deal in excisable commodities at any hour of the day, and (in many cases) of the night also; and the proceedings are so summary and sudden, that a man may be convicted twenty times by a commissioner to the total exclusion of trial by jury and in disregard of the common law."

Mr. BENNETT proceeded to make an animated statement of facts, from which I present the following extracts:

The profits of farming are always a little less than the profits of any other industry. Tobacco is grown out of the soil, and is crystallized in the sweat of the labor of the country. Its cultivation, therefore, ought to be cherished and fostered by legislation, and the tax which is at present collected on it ought to be repealed.

When an internal-revenue officer in the State of North Carolina (my horizon is limited by a pent-up Utica) starts out to enforce the law which has been violated (as he alleges) his posse and its mission are denominated, respectively, raiders and raids. It is not an attempt, under the civil administration of justice, to enforce a law which has been broken, but it is an attempt made by an officer armed with the commission of the General Government, surrounded by a cordon of muskets. The shimmer of the bayonets in the sunlight sharply tells how "young oppression learns its arms to wield." It is such a cordon and such an outfit that starts out to make an invasion upon the crystallized rights of the citizen.

The assessment for deficiencies is the source of more dissatisfaction than any other feature of the law, except "the midnight raid, the morning fight." Now lend me your ears, gentlemen, and let the breathing be still a moment, for I know what I am talking about. Take the case of a man who owns a distillery in the town of Washington, in the State of North Carolina. It is one hundred and twenty-five miles as the bee flies from the seat of government in North Carolina. It takes a longer time to get a ten-gallon keg of whisky out of a distillery warehouse in the town of Washington, N. C., to Raleigh, one hundred and twenty-five miles distant, even when the United States storekeeper is on the spot with the door open, than any ordinary business man would require to get a car-load of flour from New York city and have it delivered in Raleigh, N. C. If the distillery should be under temporary suspension with less than 2,000 gallons of spirits in the warehouse all the keys must be sent to the collector's office at Raleigh; and should the man at Washington desire to take out a package of ten or more gallons here is what he has to do. The man at Washington (little Washington), on Tar River, forwards his application to Raleigh for stamps through the mail at his own risk, or he pays for registering his letter, or he gets a money-order. All that takes money, and we are as poor there as church mice. We are standing up to our chins in the ashes of our ruins. Do you hear me? The distiller is actually paying the Government a premium for the privilege of handling its own money already covered into the Treasury through the post-office. That is not all. He is really paying the Government a premium for the privilege of handling its own money already covered into the Treasury by the so-called collector. When all this is done the collector at Raleigh gives a stamp and issues instructions to the general storekeeper to proceed to the distillery in little Washington, one hundred and twenty-five miles off, with the keys and stamp and release the ten-gallon keg.

Then there is another branch of the system. Here in North Carolina (and, indeed, it occurs practically everywhere, I suppose) the amount of loss by leakage has to be ascertained by regauging, and the tax must be remitted before the general storekeeper has started off with the keys. How they ascertain by regauging the amount of leakage from each package under these circumstances is a problem. The general storekeeper (taking him at Raleigh) has found his quickest way to Washington to be from Raleigh by way of Weldon and Norfolk, Va., by rail; thence to Edenton, N. C.; thence by steamer to Jamesville, and thence by the Jamesville Railroad to Washington; and this trip, owing to the failure of connections at certain points, occupies a space of five days going and five days returning. And all this expense of traveling and the officer's salary at $4 a day become necessary to release a ten-gallon keg of whisky, the tax on which amounts to $9.

Now, is not that making one's poverty completely splendid? The truth of the business is, that we are in such a hurry in this country that we never have time to stop to correct abuses unless they are of the most glaring character. The collector, besides, gets a percentage on the stamps sold. This computation of time is based upon the supposition that the general storekeeper travels on the lightning express, or what we call there the "cannon-ball train," between the two points. It often happens, however, as I am credibly informed, that the actual time consumed in the transmission of stamps between Washington and Raleigh is no less than two or three weeks. This engenders much profanity and disloyalty.

Mr. BENNETT was followed by Mr. CANDLER, of Georgia, from whose statement I submit the following extracts:

I desire to emphasize, as far as I am able, the statements made by my friend from Tennessee [Mr. DIBRELL] and by the two gentlemen from North Carolina [Messrs. VANCE and BENNETT]. The same state of things which they represent as existing in Tennessee and North Carolina I am prepared to say, from my personal observation, exists in Georgia. The twenty counties which I represent in the House of Representatives from that State have, perhaps, within their borders more distilleries than all the other counties in the State of Georgia. The evils attending the system of the collection of taxes on distilled spirits exist there as they exist in Tennessee and North Carolina, and everything that has been said by the gentlemen who have already spoken as applying to those States applies also to the State of Georgia.

In addition to the evils enumerated by the distinguished Senator from North Carolina has been the shooting down in my own State of innocent citizens—of citizens who have not violated the law; citizens who are found by those raiding parties at distilleries, who happen to be there by mere chance, are shot down by these raiders, and when grand juries of the counties in which the crimes are committed return true bills against them for murder, the cases are transferred to the Federal courts. Not only that, but after the cases are so transferred, the district attorneys, the very men whose duty it is to prosecute violaters of the law, are assigned to the defense of these murderers of our citizens; the Federal courts holding that in case of crime committed by a Federal officer, and claimed by him to be in the discharge of his duty as such, he is not amenable to State courts, and district attorneys are loud in their oratory in support of this position. I have known that of my own knowledge to occur in the northern district of Georgia. I have known in one of the counties which I have the honor to represent a case of this sort: Men intrusted with the collection of this tax went to the house of a poor farmer and ordered his wife to prepare breakfast for them, which she declined to do. They ordered her again to prepare breakfast, and she still declined to do it. Her husband came up and, as a matter of course, stood by his wife. He said to them, "Gentlemen, my wife is sick, and we are not prepared to get breakfast for you." Whereupon they assaulted him, and then went to Atlanta and swore out a warrant against him for obstructing an officer in the discharge of duty. He went before the grand jury of his county and procured indictments against them for assault with intent to murder, and the Federal court refused to deliver him, and the officer was defended by the district attorney.

One other idea I would suggest: It may appear strange to gentlemen, and doubtless is strange, that those outrages of which we complain should exist in a community that claims to be civilized and enlightened. But they do exist, and the reason why they do exist is that the internal-revenue system is so odious that good men can not be found to take the positions and to discharge the duties of the offices. The result is that the gaugers and storekeepers and deputy marshals are generally bad and irresponsible men and political renegades. They are generally men who accept these positions for the money that is in them. They are men who have no very well-defined ideas of their official duties or of the rights of citizens.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee, followed Mr. CANDLER. The following statements of facts are impressive:

I feel it to be rather presumptuous in me to attempt to say anything in addition to what has been already so well said, but I will address my remarks in some measure to the inquiry put by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY]. I do not think there is any disposition on the part of the people whom I represent to rebel against the collection of the tax upon distilled spirits.

Mr. KELLEY. I did not suggest that. Pardon me. I asked whether the repeal of the internal-revenue system was impracticable.

Mr. CALDWELL. I did not attribute that to you. I will get to the point directly. I think, as stated by my friend from Georgia, that the entire question is embraced in this statement: that we want to get rid of a system which is the most oppressive, the most annoying, and certainly the most undemocratic (not using the word in a party sense) that was ever put upon any people.

For instance, I will relate an incident in the current history of this business in the State of Tennessee. A man by the name of Davis, who stood higher in the estimate of the department authorities than any man who ever held a similar position under the internal-revenue system, committed murder after murder, and was knighted, so to speak, by all the Federal authorities having control of the internal-revenue system. He was promoted, his pay was increased, and he was given enlarged jurisdiction. Finally in the street of a town he shot a young man who was walking away from him in the back, and he was indicted in the State court. His case was transferred to the United States court, and the judges of the district and of the circuit court of the United States certified a difference of opinion in order to get the question before the supreme court as to the jurisdiction. The supreme court affirmed the jurisdiction of the circuit court of the United States. The case came back to the Federal court, and the prosecuting attorney of the United States was assigned to the defense of this man.

Mr. HISCOCK. Who prosecuted him?

Mr. CALDWELL. A private counsel.

Mr. HISCOCK. The Government did not prosecute him?

Mr. CALDWELL. No; the Government required District Attorney Warden to defend him. Now, how did this man get out? He got out under this state of facts: The hurrah which he had created all over the several counties running through Mr. MCMILLIN'S district, and my own, and Mr. DIBRELL'S, and all over the country, had raised such a state of affairs that the authorities finally declared an amnesty, and they had an absolute truce and treaty of peace between these tyrannous raiders and the men who were fighting against them. And there was an agreement that the case should be nolprossed in the Federal court, and a number of prosecutions dismissed.

If the committee desires light on the question, I can introduce a gentleman who is now in the employment of the Federal Government, Capt. Michael Keegan, who was before the war in the United States Army, and who was during the war in the United States Army, who bore the commission of the Government, who is a gallant man and gentleman, who went with this man Davis on his different raids, but who had the courage and the manhood to protest against his lawlessness. Instead of going to a man's distillery in broad daylight and treating him as an officer of the Government ought to treat a citizen, they would come around in the dark an hour before day, and would charge the distillery with a whoop and yell, and they would shout and rear around and scare everybody to death. If Davis found anything wrong, instead of transporting the property and carrying it away, as he could have done, he would deliberately and of malice prepense destroy it before the owner's eyes.

What was the result of this? Under our system of constitutional government no branch of the Government should be allowed to place that sort of power—the power of judge, jury, and executioner—in the hands of any man, especially in the hands of such whiskified desperadoes as Davis and his cohorts. Human nature would not stand it. They had a regular battle. There were sieges, mines, and countermines. Davis was a desperate character; I understand that he was a rebel bushwhacker during the war, not a regular soldier in arms fighting against the Government. The result was that he was finally shot down in a county in Mr. DIBRELL's district by men who had come hundreds of miles, evidently, and had prepared an ambuscade along his path and shot him down. There never has been a prosecution of these men, because they absolutely disappeared into the earth. They were absolute strangers in that part of the country. Not a man, woman, or child within one hundred miles knew one of them. This man Davis had so concentrated the hate of everybody upon him through all that section of country that nobody would think of giving information against those who shot him down.

Next came Senator BROWN, of Georgia, from whose well-considered statement, corroborating those of the gentlemen who had preceded as to the cruel execution of the law, I submit but a single extract:

Mr. Chairman, I come here rather on the invitation of my friend Senator VANCE, who has been before you and who said that some of the Southern delegation were to appear before this committee with a view of submitting some considerations on the subject of internal-revenue taxation. My position is very well known to members of the Senate. I believe that we ought to repeal the entire internal-revenue system. I think it is not the proper basis of collecting the revenue. A short period after the termination of the war of 1812 our fathers were a unit on the mode of collecting the revenue. They all consented (Whigs and Democrats or whatever party names they had) that the revenue for the support of the Federal Government should be collected at the ports. I believe that to be the proper mode. In times of war and of great emergencies we have to resort to all means of collecting revenue, as in the case of the war of 1812 and in the case of the late unfortunate war, the Government was forced to resort to that means as well as to the collection of what it could collect at the ports.

But we have already continued the system much longer than we ought to continue it, I think, and to my mind there are very cogent reasons why it should not be continued. The two armies of collectors are very unnecessary, I think. We have at the ports all the officers necessary to collect the revenue of the Government. But we have also an army of internal-revenue collectors—a sort of political machinery, though I do not speak of it as being used for politics. It is a sort of political machinery in my State, and I presume it is in all the States. It is increased or diminished according to the will of the party in power. Excuses are found for employing many of these officers about election times. They are a very convenient sort of machines for getting up small criminal cases and getting costs into the pockets of attorneys, marshals, and other officers. The people of my State have been annoyed very much on this question. There is no end to the little petty oppressions growing out of the system. My people are as nearly a unit (especially in the upper portions of my State, where the revenue officers have been practicing) in the demand for the repeal of this system as they are upon any question.

It seems to me there is no use for this machinery. If you ask me whether a tax upon whisky and tobacco shall be collected, I say yes; but I would not have the Federal Government collect it. I would have the distiller give in a statement of his brandy or whisky, or whatever he may have made, to the tax receiver, and pay the tax upon it to the county or the State. Indeed, I should like to see whisky and tobacco pay a large proportion of the State taxes of my own State. If they were only taxed as they are now, and if the proceeds were given to the treasury of the State, they would pay all the expenses of the State of Georgia, as they would, I think, of every other State. I believe that the Government received some $140,000,000 last year from the taxes on whisky and tobacco. I have not made a calculation as to the aggregate amount of State taxes throughout the country, but I suppose that the taxes collected on whisky and tobacco last year amounted to as much as the State taxes of every State in the Union. If these taxes were left to the States themselves and if the revenues of the Government were collected as heretofore at the ports, there certainly would be no need for an army of collectors, and that would be a point gained.

From the remarks of Mr. SCALES, of North Carolina, I submit the following extract:

This is a subject on which I feel, and have felt, a very deep interest. It could not be otherwise if I represented properly the constituency which has sent me here. I believe with Governor BROWN that this whole internal-revenue taxation ought to be abolished at the very earliest practicable moment. The policy of this Government, established nearly one hundred years ago, was, as has been well said by Governor BROWN, that the expenses of the General Government ought to be defrayed out of the customs. The object of our fathers seemed to be that there should be no possible conflict between citizens and the General Government in the matter of taxation. The direct taxes were all turned over to the States. That has been the policy of the Government from that time to the present except in time of war; and when the war passed away, our people (looking still to that same policy and believing in it) have always insisted that the war taxes should be abolished.

Now, let me call the attention of the committee for a moment to the State of North Carolina. We raise in the State of North Carolina from all sources between $1,100,000 and $1,200,000 for the support of our local government—county and State. Of that sum about $500,000 is paid, at large, to the State. You have heard some of our friends speak of the poverty of the Southern people. We are just commencing to recover from the condition in which we were left by the war. Now, why, at a time like this, when the Government is rich, with a surplus of eighty or a hundred million dollars in the Treasury, keep up these taxes in the States? Why refuse to relieve our people at least to this extent? If the States want to raise more revenue than they now raise for education or other purposes, why not give them a chance to do it by leaving this taxation to them? We will take care of the moral question, and it can not be left in better hands than the people of North Carolina. We will take care of the mode of collection. If you will just do that, we will be able, if we choose, to add to the $1,100,000 of taxes which we now pay in North Carolina $2,500,000 more to be raised from internal revenue. We raise now about $150,000 for schools—the people of North Carolina are deeply interested in the question of education. If we can have this money from internal taxation (and I think the Government can spare it), not only can we increase our schools and improve them, but we can also increase the time during which they are kept open in the State.

This tax is an unequal tax. It rests upon the industries of the country. It rests upon the industry of tobacco, which is more profitable, and which adds more to the prosperity of the section which I represent than any other one industry that can be mentioned. Why strike this industry down? Gentlemen tell me that it is the consumers who pay the tax. We do not think that that is wherein the difficulty lies about the payment of the tax. We do not wish the tax to be retained, because it produces monopolies. It produces monopolists in the manufacture of tobacco and it produces monopolists in the manufacture of brandy. This committee reported a few days ago a bill to the House postponing the time for the collection of taxes on whisky in bond, the reason for it being, as I understand, that that interest was suffering. The bill was reported in order to relieve those men who were being crushed out. Now you heard the Senator from North Carolina tell you this morning that the whole fruit-brandy interest of North Carolina is crushed out. Mr. Chairman, there are sections of that State where a short time ago there were flourishing orchards, which were improved and kept up and which spoke for the prosperity of the country, that are now going down and abandoned because the people have no inducement to keep them up. I hope that it is not the policy of the chairman of this committee, and that it is not the policy of any member of the committee, to retain these taxes indefinitely. I hope that every gentleman looks forward to the time (and that very soon) when these taxes shall be abolished, when direct taxes shall be left to the States and left to the control of the States, and when the General Government will get its revenues entirely from the customs of the country. I believe that that time is near at hand.

The following paragraph is from the statement of Mr. COX, of North Carolina:

I am here to ask for relief of some kind. My people have been led to believe that they would get some relief at the hands of Congress, and they have gone on and submitted, up to this time, comparatively quietly. I speak of this in a political sense, not in a party sense, because we have no party in North Carolina on this question. Both parties ask a change in the system. They prefer a repeal of the internal-revenue law. I am not speaking, Mr. Chairman, of your State of Illinois, where I know that the laws are far less oppressive than they are in my State. The large manufacturers of whisky do not feel the oppression of the internal-revenue taxation. But our people have been looking for some relief; and if you give it to them they will go on and feel that Congress is doing something for them. There is getting to be a very bad sentiment in portions of North Carolina now. There is getting to be actually a state of warfare there between the officers of the Internal Revenue Bureau and the people, and the consequence is that you can not secure the service of any respectable class of men to act as revenue officers.

In my district the other day four armed men rushed into a man's house in the absence of its owner and gave as the reason for it to the owner's wife that they were searching for whisky. He had happened, about Christmas time, to go into a neighboring county and had got a small quantity of whisky, which he had consumed. These men lit a paper and threw it into the cellar and committed other outrages. The man had no redress in the courts. These revenue officers may outrage a man's family with impunity. There was a case in North Carolina where a man made an assault upon a woman; and when he came to be prosecuted for it he actually had the case removed into the Federal court. The people feel that they have no redress for these outrages upon them, and that raises a lion in their hearts. The consequence is that there is warfare going on there, and that matters are getting worse. Every lawyer knows that these revenue officers can not be tried in a State court for any offense that they may commit.

In the course of his remarks Mr. CABELL, of Virginia, said:

But, as this discussion is more particularly in reference to the internal revenue, I say frankly that I believe it ought to be abolished—ought to be cut up, root and branch. It is a system of taxation that is undemocratic, unrepublican. It is a system of taxation which our fathers deplored. It is only recognized in our laws and traditions as a system to be resorted to in time of war or great public peril; and it has been always repealed as soon as the emergency which brought it into existence was over.

This law was enacted more than twenty-two years ago. The emergency which called it into existence has long gone by. It was said in the discussions at and about the time when the law was passed that as soon as the emergency ceased the law would be repealed. But it has been continued from that day to this. It is true that the taxes upon a great many subjects of taxation have been repealed. The tax on incomes, the tax on business and occupations, and a variety of taxes of which you gentlemen know, have been all repealed; and the tax simply remains now upon two subjects, liquors and tobacco. There is a tax of 90 cents a gallon on spirits, including that distilled from fruit. However that internal-revenue system may have operated in the States in which you gentlemen reside, it has been executed in a spirit of oppression and outrage in my section of the country and in a great deal of the South. It has been executed in a manner which constituted it a disgrace to the Government and an outrage on the people.

You have no idea, gentlemen, how this system has been worked and operated in our country. No matter what you gentlemen may think of this system, you would not have tolerated it a week, or a day, or an hour in your own States. Much has been said about the moonshiners in the South. A great many people have not perhaps discharged their duty as good citizens ought to have done. There are bad men there, I admit, just as there are anywhere else, but no more in proportion than there are in other sections of this country. If this law had been carried out in your respective States in the oppressive way in which it has been carried out in my State and other States that I know of, you would not have tolerated it a week longer than you could have got to Congress and accomplished its repeal. I have seen drawn to one of the Federal courts between one hundred and fifty and two hundred poor men from the mountains of Virginia—men so poor that they would not have had the means to go there from their homes if they had to go there on their own account. I have seen men prosecuted on the most frivolous pretext. I have seen men convicted who had been procured to commit the very crimes (if you can call them crimes) for which they were convicted. It is true that the evil is less now than it was. Much of it has gone by. But still there are wrongs committed in the South through and by the operation of this internal-revenue system. You can not get the better classes of citizens (men who can be depended upon) to take the positions of deputy marshals, spies, informers, gaugers, and all those occupations that have been fastened on this system. How long do you suppose people in the Northern States would tolerate a system which started out by organizing an army company, or a squad, in a time of profound peace, running and ravaging the country with arms in their hands, seeking out the most trivial violations of the internal-revenue law?

Mr. KELLEY. Your distillers are usually distillers of small quantities of fruits or grains grown by themselves?

Mr. CABELL. Yes. They are poor men in the mountains, who have orchards which were planted by their fathers. They are remote from market and have no means or mode of transporting their fruits to market. It is true that these people have been brought up with the idea that in regard to agricultural products they should be perfectly free to raise them and to make out of them whatever they can make; and they feel that it is a visitation upon them by the Government to have this crowd of fellows sent among them to undertake to prevent them doing it.

Mr. KELLEY. Do not the fruit and grain distillers of North Carolina, of the most of Virginia, of Georgia, and of South Carolina feel this tax on their small production (the conversion into brandy of their own fruit or grain) in their purse, their basket, and their store?

Mr. CABELL. They feel it every sort of a way.

Mr. KELLEY. Then they are not like the owners of enormous distilleries and bonded warehouses of the North, where the pay of storekeepers and gaugers is an inappreciable percentage of the owners' profits?

Mr. CABELL. They are not at all like that. These small fruit distillers are men of small means. They can raise but little in the mountains. The fruit is indigenous, as you may call it, to the mountains. They are remote from railroads. The fruit will not bear transportation to market. They can not get it to market in any other way except in the shape of brandy. They can not raise much grain even in many sections of the country. They depend upon the sale of their fruit brandy, in a great measure, for their supplies of meat, bread, sugar, coffee, and other things. And when this tax has been levied, many of them are unable to comply with the law and pay it.

Mr. KELLEY. Is not the tax of 90 cents a gallon actually a tax of 90 cents upon the peck of corn or rye or upon the quantity of fruit from which it is distilled?

Mr. CABELL. Yes.

Mr. MCMILLIN, of Tennessee, who was the last gentleman to address the committee, indorsed the statements of the other gentlemen and made an earnest appeal for the repeal of the tobacco tax and the tax on fruit brandy.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I submit to the conscience and judgment of the country whether a system of taxation, the enforcement of which can possibly open the way for such outrages and oppression as are here disclosed, should be enforced upon a free people in a season of profound peace. It is a war measure. War has three times called it into force; the restoration of peace abolished it twice; and peace having been restored and maintained for twenty years, the Forty-eighth Congress will vindicate its wisdom, humanity, and patriotism by again removing it from our statute-book.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has thirty minutes.

Mr. LONG. Mr. Chairman, as I may possibly take more time than thirty minutes, and as I am entitled under an arrangement already made to succeed the next speaker, I will ask permission if necessary to overrun that time a little and will give an equal amount to the gentleman who shall follow me.

I think, sir, that I am in similar case—if I knew more Latin I should probably say "in consimili casu"—with many members upon this floor who pretend to no such thorough and special knowledge of this subject as is possessed by the distinguished gentleman who has just taken his seat, but are called upon to determine their line of action upon general information and upon such facts and statements as have thus far been laid before them by those who have already spoken.

I am sure that there are many who, if they were to speak at all, would speak, as I do, more to obtain information than to convey it, and less to make impressions than to have their own confirmed or corrected. In other words, we are feeling our way. I think we may claim, however, that we approach the subject with no indirection, and that we resent a little the imputation, so far as it includes us, that we are governed in our judgment either by sentimental considerations on the one hand or a desire on the other to subordinate this present practical issue to the ulterior question of tariff reform or tariff protection. I think too that I caught in the remarks of one gentleman on the other side of the House who spoke on Saturday last, although I do not find them in the RECORD, the reproachful term "temperance crank." I know that I have read in the reports or have heard a reference to "the fanaticisms of prohibitionists." The eloquent gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY] also took occasion to make a special reference to any who allow themselves in this matter of a tax to regard the question of its relation to the evil and the horror of intemperance. For one, Mr. Chairman, I do not care to be put in the category of those who can not consider a question upon its merits; and that I may say just that, is my apology for saying anything at all. And, sir, when I recall the course of this debate; when I remember that at the very outset it was intimated in the Commissioner's letter that if the commodity in question went under any other name than that of whisky there would be no issue; when I remember that it is the friends of this bill who first threw into the discussion the subject of temperance under the guise of averting that subject; and when I find from the beginning to the end an extreme sensitiveness on their part lest the moral aspect of the case shall affect its determination, I begin to suspect that the moral element is one that can not be left out of this case, as it ought not to be left out of any topic of legislation. But, sir, whatever my views upon this question of prohibition or of the tariff may be, of one thing I am sure, and that is that I can consider this question without prejudice derived from either source and in its light as a business and legislative matter.

Mr. Chairman, I confess that when I approached this subject I was inclined favorably to the bill. It seemed to me that its tendency was to correct a discrimination against whisky which did not exist against any other subject of taxation. I was struck with the earnest and incisive argument of the gentleman from Arkansas, and with the emphasis with which he insisted upon the special injustice done to this one item. It began to dawn upon me, however, that his argument was proving too much. The query arose, if there is such gross and special singling out of one commodity for excessive and unjust burden, why did such an enormity enter into the mind or secure the sanction of a former Legislature? Injustice is not often gratuitously done. When a law is made some good reason is at least supposed to underlie it. So I make a further inquiry, and I find the case has another side and is in harmony with our system of taxation and not in antagonism to it. I find that the effect of this proposed bill is not to remove a discrimination, but to make one by giving whisky for the payment of the tax on it a longer term from the date of its production than any other commodity has in fact and in practice. In looking, for instance, at the law concerning the importation of foreign merchandise, I find that the system is less favorable to imports than the system now so harshly criticised is to whisky. For with reference to whisky the law is, as I understand, that the tax may be paid at any time within three years from its warehousing, and paid not only without interest but with an allowance for leakage so generous and large that that is itself a source of profit. On the other hand, with reference to imported merchandise the law is that the tax must be paid within one year. It may be paid within two years more; but if it overrun the one year a single day there is an increase charged of 10 per cent., and if not paid within the full three years the merchandise is confiscated and sold.

But we are asked to consider other articles of domestic production as more germane to this issue. Well, here we find that the law with regard to fermented liquor and tobacco is that the tax is, I admit, payable only when the product is sold for consumption. That does seem at first to be a difference and a discrimination, as has been charged, from the case of whisky, on which the tax is payable within three years from its warehousing whether sold for consumption or not. But here again I find that the law can be vindicated, that the law is founded in practical common sense. I find again that this seeming difference or discrimination is not gratuitous, that it is not unreasonable, that it is not in fact substantial discrimination. What is the reason? Let us look into the rationale. Beer and tobacco deteriorate by age. The whole tendency of the natural law of self-interest—and as practical legislators we always reckon on natural laws—the whole tendency of the law of self-interest urges the owners of beer and tobacco to sell them for consumption as early as possible. Every day's delay diminishes their value; every day's delay adds to the burden of interest in carrying them in stock. Legislative wisdom therefore says that the public interest in the tax on beer and tobacco is fully protected by collecting it when they enter into consumption.

Mr. WILLIS. Suppose, governor, they find no consumer?

Mr. LONG. But they do. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIS. In this case they do not.

Mr. LONG. But take whisky—I mean, take it for the purpose of argument. [Laughter.] Unlike a member of Congress, the older it is the more valuable [laughter]; age is its necessity and its crown. The increase in the value of whisky by age neutralizes any loss of interest on the investment, and is really an element of profit. In the case of whisky, differing from the case of beer and tobacco, the whole tendency of this natural law of self-interest is to delay its sale for consumption.

There are, therefore, as you see, two reasons why the collection of the tax on whisky should not be left, as in the case of beer and tobacco, until the article goes into consumption. The first is, this tax is a tax on production. Tobacco and beer and intoxicating liquors are harmful and injurious we all agree. They are not the favorites of wise statesmanship. They are not conducive to the public welfare. A tax on their production is a tax on their accumulation, just as a bounty on their production would be a premium for it. The tax, therefore, should be collected at or reasonably near the time of production and as an incident to it. To effect that object no statute is necessary, as I have shown, in the case of beer and tobacco, because the natural law secures their early sale and therefore early taxation—taxation at the time and as an incident of production. But as to whisky the statute is necessary, and it is necessary not to enforce a discrimination, but to prevent discrimination by insuring this same result of early taxation. This whisky law, then, which has been assailed as being so unreasonable and discriminating, is shown to be founded entirely on reason and entirely in harmony with our system.

But the second reason is the main one, because it is the practical reason. It is practical experience which at once suggested and demonstrated the wisdom of the present law, or rather of what the present law intended. It is worth while to look into the history of this matter for a moment for our information. Formerly the tax on whisky, like that on beer and tobacco, was collected at the time of consumption. But under this same natural law of which I have spoken of, under the inducement to store whiskies in warehouses for a term of years in order to get the increased value of their aging, there accumulated not only whisky but there accumulated also the opportunities, temptations, and incidents of a system of fraud. It broke out, as you remember, in plague-spots that were a national disgrace and loss, and which we blush to remember. Great stores of this commodity liable to taxation yet reluctant to meet it, growing more valuable the longer they escaped it, gathering around them an army of spies and subordinates, and constituting an interest which could furnish vast sums for a corruption fund—all this necessitated, not as a piece of gratuitous injustice, not as a piece of special discrimination, but as a measure of wise legislation, the enactment of a law, the law which in 1868 required the tax to be paid substantially at the time of production; or in other words, in order to give reasonable time, within one year.

Therefore I say that the law is reasonable; and the only question I have as to its merit is that perhaps it did not go far enough and make the limit for the payment of the tax less than a year, and bring it, as I think one gentleman from Mississippi suggested, down to the immediate time of production. For what was the result even of the law of 1868? The accumulation of whisky still went on, and it went on to such an extent that in 1878 an earnest appeal was made to Congress to extend the limit. It was said then, as it is said now that relief must be granted; that otherwise ruin, panic, and bankruptcy would follow; and that if relief were granted—remember this—the evil would not occur again; the burned child would dread the fire too much. And the extension was granted in 1878 for one year, in 1879 for three years; but even then not without protest. It was argued by Garfield, I think, and by others that relief would only stimulate production; that each year would see not a reduction but an increase of the product; and that at the end of three years a still greater outcry would be made for another extension and be backed by a still greater monopoly. Every prediction then made has proved true. Look at the figures.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] in his admirable speech tells us that the production of whisky in 1879, the first year after the extension was granted, was 71,000,000 of gallons, in 1880 it was 90,000,000 of gallons, and in 1881 it was 117,000,000 of gallons. Could you have a more striking fulfillment of the prophecy of increase of production? And not only was that prophecy fulfilled, but there was also fulfilled the prophecy that an application would again be made for an extension when the three years then granted were up. In 1882 an appeal for another extension came, and it was refused. The result was good. No national calamity or panic or loss followed. The production fell off at once on that refusal. The production, which in 1881 had been 117,000,000 of gallons, in 1882 was only 105,000,000 of gallons, and in 1883 it came down to 74,000,000 of gallons.

Mr. Chairman, these figures conclude the whole case. In the light of them what are we, as sensible men, called upon to do? The case resolves itself almost into a mathematical demonstration. The three years' extension granted in 1878 increased the evil; the refusal to grant the extension in 1882 lessened it. Which example, which precedent are we going to follow? As the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] puts it, if the extension of 1878 and 1879 increased production from 71,000,000 of gallons to 117,000,000 of gallons, how much would the extension asked this year increase the production? And I add, if the refusal of 1882 brought down the production from 117,000,000 of gallons to 74,000,000 of gallons, how much will a refusal now reduce the production?

What is the use to talk in the view of this experience and these figures? I do not blame the parties in interest for urging this matter. The individual in present necessity always wants present relief. His personal interest blinds him, as it is liable to blind every man, to the public interest, and sometimes to his own. I believe the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] is speaking here for his constituents with a most sincere good faith and the most thorough conviction. But pass this bill and extend this time, and when the limit is reached he will find that instead of 70,000,000 of gallons on hand in storehouses as now, and instead of $66,000,000 of taxes unpaid, the amount will be increased from 25 to 50 per cent. The gentleman admits this result when he suggests that if this bill is passed the relief given the farmers will increase the sale of corn for distillation. If it be true, therefore, that the passage of this bill will bring increased production and an increase of the evil, then when the extension of time we are now asked to give shall have passed there will again come with redoubled force the cry for relief. More than likely the 4½ per cent. interest guaranteed to the Government by this bill will in the mean time have been legislated off, and even that poor sop be denied. The monopoly will then have still greater interests in peril and a still greater fund assessed to back it. More banks will then be interested and more influences invoked upon this Chamber. Then indeed will there be so much at stake that possibly ruin and bankruptcy and loss may follow if relief be not granted. And let me tell gentlemen that then the question will be not when the tax shall be paid, but whether it shall be paid at all. This is not a question of good nature; it is not a question of personal relief. If it were it would be of less consequence. It is a question of grave public policy and of far-reaching effect on the public welfare.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MILLS). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WAIT. I trust the time of the gentleman will be extended.

Mr. LONG. I have time of my own at the expiration of the hour of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY], and I ask permission to take that now.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] being extended?

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] has time of his own.

The CHAIRMAN. The time granted to him by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] has been exhausted.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. He can go on in his own time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman proceeding? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LONG. I make two conditional admissions. If it were true that in case of the rejection of this bill there would be ruin and panic and bankruptcy, then, whoever is at fault, it would be a very strong argument. But let us look at that matter. First, make allowance for the extravagance of argument and the zeal of advocacy. Second, and it is conclusive, remember that no such results followed the refusal to grant relief in 1882. Third, if relief is necessary, why should not the parties themselves furnish it? The whole amount of the $66 000 000 of taxes which are unpaid is not due to-day. As I understand, it is distributed over the next three years. If that is so, then it amounts to some $22,000,000 a year, and that twenty-two millions distributing itself along over the whole year. Why do not these parties themselves take care of the amount? It is indeed urged that the Government does not need this tax; that its coffers are already running over. Ah! is it admitted, on the other hand, that if the Government did need it this request would not be made? If so, then it would still be true that the danger of panic and ruin would still be just as great then as now. The fact is, and we all know it, that this resort is made to the Government rather than to anybody else because it is thought to be the easiest way out of a difficulty.

Suppose the parties in interest could not look to the Government. What would they do? They would look elsewhere, just as they will now if we refuse to pass this bill. What will be the result of its rejection? The result will be wholesome. The production of whisky will be staid, just as the refusal to pass a similar measure in 1882 staid and reduced it. The present stock will go its normal way. If it go out of the country, escaping taxation by export, the country will bid it good riddance. If it remain, the Government will get its tax and go on paying its debts; and it needs every dollar it can get for that purpose.

But you ask, how will those engaged in this interest raise the money required? The amount at stake is, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] said, a mere bagatelle ($22,000,000 a year distributed along the whole period). In comparison with the amount of capital in this country seeking investment, and constituting the resources of our banks and loaning institutions, it is a small sum. I submit that if the Government can afford to leave this money on interest at 4½ per cent. (which is not one of its functions, and those who have regard for the Constitution should remember this), then certainly other institutions whose function it is to loan money will be glad to secure so good a loan at so good a rate. They can have exactly the same security that the Government has. They can have the same whisky, three-fourths of the value of which is in the tax. They can demand the same bonds which the Government demands. Why, sir, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] tells me computation shows that the allowance by the Government for the one item of leakage is so generous and so profitable that it alone would secure and pay the interest on the loan.

Mr. WILLIS. That is not the fact.

Mr. LONG. Possibly not. I state it upon the authority of the gentleman from Iowa.

But certainly if the loan is good, other institutions will gladly take it. If it is not good, then the Government, charged with the trust of the people's money, would be criminal to leave $66,000,000 of it at longer risk. Here is a point which should not be overlooked. Let me put it in this way: To-day the Government has at risk in this whisky business, but not now payable, $66,000,000 of the people's money—theirs by law, theirs by the act of the whisky producers themselves, who manufactured this product, knowing the law and estopped to plead ignorance of it. And, I say, if the amount is secure to the Government it will be equally secure for any other who may lend it. If it is not secure, it should be collected just as soon as the law will permit. For if a crash is to come, if this whisky shall decline in price and not be sufficient to secure this debt or tax, I ask any practical man of what value will be the bonds? How many of the sureties will be responsible and good in case of such a crash, and what demand will Congress not be subjected to to favor and relieve even those who are responsible and good? For it will then be said, and said with a great show of justice, that Congress itself might have collected this tax, but by delay and extension encouraged the financial avalanche.

But perhaps you say that this loan can not practically be obtained from the capital of the country, because the creditor knows that, if he should demand its payment at any time, the price of whisky might be reduced to a song by its sacrifice, and so payment made impossible. But that depends—it depends entirely upon the purpose with which this bill is pressed and the probable action of the parties who are interested in it. If this bill is not sought with the sure and honest purpose of staying production—if this bill should, as I believe it will (and as was the case before) stimulate production, and thereby glut the market still more and reduce the price by its surplus—then to pass the bill would certainly be to promote the very evils from which relief is sought.

On the other hand, if there is an honest purpose to stay production till the present excessive supply is distributed and consumed in the ordinary channels, that result can be obtained by the voluntary act of the parties themselves and without any bill. The passage of this bill would not aid in that result. Any capitalist loaning the money and taking the amount off the hands of the Government would be secure with things just as they are. So that, taking either horn of the dilemma, there is no justification for the bill. If, however, you still say the danger is so great and the security so frail that no such risk ought to be put upon the capital of the country under any circumstances, then I answer—and the common sense of the House will sustain me in saying—that the time has come to face the question of the repeal of the tax itself and not leave the Government counting as an asset something which has no value. Disguise it as you may, the real question before us is not a temporary question of extension, it is a question of repeal.

There is only one other ground on which, if it existed, I should be perfectly ready to grant this relief, and that is, if anybody in this country had been misled or wronged by the action of the Government. But, as has been so often and so conclusively shown, fair warning was given in 1878. Producers, distillers, bankers, speculators, all had their eyes wide open to the risk they ran. They have taken their chances as absolutely as the gambler who sits down at the card-table. There has been in this matter an element of risks in futures that is neither altogether deserving nor innocent. This has grown into a gigantic interest of speculation that comes with poor grace to ask Congress to help it out of its own folly. It is a monopoly, which it is said has swallowed up the smaller whisky interests; and while I should deplore the possibility, if it existed, of ruin or bankruptcy anywhere, I believe that sound, honest public policy requires the reduction and dissipation of this huge cancer into the ordinary tissues of wholesome business vitality.

I hear it said that this interest has paid a thousand millions into the public Treasury; that it has supported our armies; that it has paid our debts; that it has maintained our Government. But, sir, it has not paid one cent. Whisky has never paid a dollar. The people it is who out of the earnings of their toil have paid millions for it and its curses. If a thousand million dollars have gone into the public Treasury, whisky has been only the rotten bridge over which it has passed. Contributed to the public welfare! It is rather the dynamite of modern civilization; and when you reckon, as you do, the billions by which you measure its production and cost, you are reckoning not any addition to the public welfare, but you are reckoning the extent of the public and national ruin, waste, and poverty. There you may look for loss, and panic, and bankruptcy, and not to that bagatelle of a few million dollars that is about to be transferred from the books of the Government to the books of private lenders.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY] waxed eloquent, and no man can be more so, when he called this commodity a very "hell-broth" of woe, and asked if we were prepared to pour it broadcast over the land, instead of confining it in the receptacle of the warehouses of the nation. He knows better. He is not deluded with the notion that our warehouses are built and stored with whisky for the pleasure of its accumulation or with the benevolent big bandana handkerchief purpose of keeping it from public use and public consumption. He knows that to pass this bill will indeed pile it up in those warehouses, but will pile it up only to be poured out a few years later—and the longer delay the more abundantly—in a deluge of ruin and madness over the land.

I, too, like him, find my guide not in any noisy clamor, not in any false outcry of the popular voice, but in my own conscience and judgment. And these tell me, as a matter of sound public policy, of recent historical experience, of present justice, of the true interest even of the parties appellant, of honest fulfillment of obligation and law, of statesmanlike prevention of greater impending evils, and of arresting, even at some possible cost to a few, a disease which, by delay, will only grow worse in its general calamity—these unite and tell me that it is my duty, even aside from all questions of domestic good morals, to vote against this bill. [Great applause.]

Mr. HURD took the floor and said: I will yield for twenty minutes to my colleague [Mr. FOLLETT].

Mr. FOLLETT. Mr. Chairman, it is easy in the discussion of a question such as that we are now considering in this committee to take a few facts and separate them from other facts and draw a conclusion that is fallacious; but when we group the facts as a whole to ascertain the results of legislation and of prior laws the conclusion at which we arrive is necessarily a conclusion upon which we can rely.

I have been surprised at the results alleged to have been reached from the facts which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] has presented, as such results could only have been obtained by a deceptive grouping of facts and by separating them from others, and I am more surprised at the conclusion he has reached by thus separating the facts disclosed from those withheld.

Mr. Chairman, in 1878, when the time for holding goods in bond was extended from one year to three, the same arguments were presented and the same objections were urged that are urged in this discussion. And what were the results which followed? We have no hesitation in saying that those arguments were shown to be without foundation and the results were also without foundation.

It was said then, Mr. Chairman, that the Treasury of the United States was in need of money, as it was, and that by the proposed legislation you would withdraw from the Treasury of the United States a large amount of money which otherwise would find its way there. But what was the result?

Now I want to read a few figures in view of the statements made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] and others in this discussion. The entire amount of revenue collected from spirits in 1877 was $52,000,000; in 1878, $45,000,000; in 1879, instead of decreasing, it was $47,000,000 and over; in 1880, $55,000,000, nearly $56,000,000; in 1881, $62,000,000; in 1882, $64,000,000, and in 1883, $66,000,000.

So instead of the result being what it was claimed it would be, that the amount received from this source would be diminished to the Treasury, it was steadily increased, and has been from that day to this.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is claimed this is a loan of money by the Government to the distillers or to the owners of this whisky. A loan from what source derived? From what money does the Government part? Not a dollar. Not a dollar of interest has the Government in a single gallon of whisky that is in bond to-day except when it is taken out of bond and put upon the market it is entitled to the amount of tax which it collects on whisky.

The whisky has never belonged to the Government, and under existing law never can until the time comes when the owner of the goods desires to place them upon the market for consumption within the limited period.

It is also said that this is special legislation. Is there any other interest, Mr. Chairman, involved as this interest is? And can you reach it except by special legislation, if this be special legislation? You have taxed nothing else in the same way, and if you are to give relief you can give relief only by special legislation, because special legislation imposed the tax. I am surprised, therefore, that gentlemen upon this floor, representing the great interests of the people of the United States, should take the position they do take. I am surprised, when an interest such as this, contributing its millions year by year to the national Treasury, the moment those engaged in it come to Congress presenting a claim such as they present in this case, that they should be met by the argument that they are asking special legislation, when, as I have said, this is the only interest that has been selected and made the subject of special legislation. It is also claimed, Mr. Chairman, that, notwithstanding the fact that this is the only commodity upon which internal-revenue taxes are laid which you require to pay the tax until the owner deems it advisable to place it upon the market for consumption, yet that in the case of tobacco you do not keep it in bond exceeding a period of one year. Why, sir, if that were the case with respect to this interest it would never come here for relief. If they had a market for their goods, and were it to the interest of the man holding the goods to place them upon the market for consumption, he would not be knocking at the doors of Congress and asking for relief from an onerous tax. So also with reference to malt liquors. They are needed for consumption. The market admits them, and overproduction does not occur.

Mr. Chairman, the causes which led to this very overproduction are exactly the causes which have led to overproduction in every other line of industry. The difference is that in the one case the man that produced risked nothing but the cost of overproduction, while in this case the man who produces, if compelled to take these goods out of bond, takes them out of bond at a cost of from 400 to 600 per cent., and in advance of the cost of production.

In 1878 when the time was extended for holding these goods in bond we were just emerging from the depression of the panic of 1873. Every branch of industry in the United States was stimulated to overproduction; and that overproduction was no greater here in this article than it was in other branches of industry. Further than that, as the figures show, there was a large export demand, which the producers had the right to expect would continue. Had the demand continued as it existed in the years 1879, 1880, and 1881 this large surplus would have been reduced. We exported in 1879 nearly 15,000,000 gallons; in 1880, nearly 17,000,000 gallons; in 1881 nearly 16,000,000 gallons were exported; and in 1882 this went down to 8,000,000 gallons; and in 1883 to 5,000,000 gallons. These laws of trade are variable and not subject to the exact calculations which enable a man of business to know what is in the future; and the question now for this American Congress to determine when an industry such as this is, contributing as this has contributed to the revenues of the Government, comes here and asks us for relief is shall we grant it. They do not ask to have the tax upon them taken off; they do not ask to have it reduced; and because they have not asked that they have been met with opposition from one quarter. They have not asked to have the payment of this tax postponed except upon the identical conditions that the gentleman from Massachusetts has said applies in the case of imported goods. On the contrary, what they ask is simply to give them the privilege with reference to such goods as are on hand manufactured and in bonded warehouses on the first day of December, 1883, to allow them five years instead of three, as the law now requires, within which to take them out for consumption. The effect of that, Mr. Chairman, will be not to postpone the taking of the goods out of bond, but simply to give to the holders of these goods such leeway as will enable them to determine when they want to have them out instead of forcing them out from month to month under the provisions of the existing law, and compelling them to put them upon the market, which is already largely overstocked.

Now, to show the effect of withholding the relief asked for one year ago. Why, the gentleman from Massachusetts and other members who have spoken in opposition to this bill claim that the effect of refusing this relief one year ago was not to distress business generally, to increase bankruptcies in the country, and this interest has not been entirely bankrupted. What, however, has been the effect? I have in my hand some extracts from the report of the superintendent of the Chamber of Commerce of Cincinnati, in which he says:

In bourbon and rye goods the business has been extremely unsatisfactory during the whole period, there having been no advance whatever in any of these goods, except in specially favored brands, although the expense of carrying and losses from shrinkage were adding constantly to their cost. In many cases goods which came out of bond in 1883 have been sold by parties unwilling to pay the tax at lower prices than had been paid for the goods three years before. In some cases three-year-old goods have been sold at 35 to 40 cents per gallon in bond. This, of course, is the legitimate fruit of undue production in other years; but the larger part of the immediate distress might have been prevented had there been a suitable disposition in the late Congress to have furnished a proper remedy. A tithe of the providential care due every department of business in the country would have saved the holders of these goods the necessity of selling their goods at ruinous prices or resorting to the extraordinary method of exporting them to foreign countries with a view to their return at a more auspicious period. Large quantities of bourbon goods, after the adjournment of Congress, were sent to Bermuda and Germany, a company having been formed in this city for the especial purpose of taking charge of such shipments.

I have here the prices for the year ending August 31, 1883, of the goods that are now in controversy. On the 1st of September, 1882, the price was $1.18. During the period that elapsed from the time the last Congress adjourned—and I know that up to the last day and the last hour of that Congress a measure of relief so just as this was seen to be by every business man in the city of Cincinnati it was supposed could not possibly be defeated in an American Congress—but from that time forward these goods have ranged from $1.10 to $1.13. In other words, the price went from $1.18 down to the prices that are carrying down from week to week and from day to day the men that have these goods. They have no market. They can not be sold. And these men ask simply to give them an opportunity to sell their goods as the market demands them, instead of the Government forcing them to put these goods on a market already overstocked.

Let me advert to another point. I have shown one great cause of the surplus to have been the fact that the export demand was not only diminished, but that it has almost entirely stopped. In consequence of that distillers reduced their capacity; the amount of production has been steadily diminishing; and I have the figures here to show what it has been from year to year from that time to this.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is that the Commissioner's report you have?

Mr. FOLLETT. Yes, sir; it is the Commissioner's report, and from it I take these figures.

The production in 1879 was 71,000,000 gallons. That, as I said before, was about the time the business interests of this country in all their departments had increased; everything was stimulating and every branch of business was necessarily boomed by this undue stimulation. In 1880 the stimulus was still greater, and we produced that year 99,000,000 gallons. In 1881 there was still more of a stimulus, a large export continuing up to that time; then it was 117,000,000 gallons. In 1882 there were 105,000,000. In 1883 there were 74,000,000. The reduction was nearly 25 per cent. by the closing of distilleries, many of which to-day are going to decay because of the fact that there is no demand for these goods.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the proposition that is submitted here is simply a business proposition. What matters it to us how these men became involved in their present trouble? There is a large industry in this country, an industry that is not confined to the State of Kentucky. On the contrary, the State of Illinois produces nearly twice as much as that State; the State of Ohio about twice as much. Kentucky produces spirits. All the Western and corn-growing States produce spirits. You collect a large revenue out of these spirits; and the simple question that presents itself now is, this industry being involved in the difficulty under which it is now placed, whether or not the Congress of the United States, when they ask for relief as a business matter, with no possible loss to the Government, with no diminution of its securities, with no giving up of any right which the Government has, whether or not we shall stand in the way and say to them, "You are engaged in an illegitimate traffic, and we therefore deny you the relief you ask for."

Mr. HURD. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN].

Mr. FORAN. Mr. Chairman, as explanatory of my vote upon this bill permit me to say that I am at a loss to understand the precise nature of the opposition to this measure. It is conceded by every member upon the floor that a great industry, an industry from which the Government has derived as high as $80,000,000 revenue a year, is seriously embarrassed and endangered, and that other interests directly and indirectly connected with that industry are also seriously threatened, if not jeopardized. That it is within the scope of the delegated powers of Congress to grant the relief asked, no one can deny. That the Government will be in any sense injured, or even in the slightest or minutest degree embarrassed, by affording this relief no member has had the hardihood to claim. The industry, interests, and business threatened are purely and wholly American. Our own people, our own citizens alone are asking for this remedial legislation.

If it is constitutional to accede to the demand; if the general public will be in no manner injured thereby, and if the proposed legislation entails no expenditure of public money, no loss or damage to the Government, no loss or damage to any private individual or to any private or vested right, and if it involves no great question of public morals, then why should the asked-for relief not be granted? I have carefully listened to all that has been said upon this question, and must say that under all the circumstances and in view of all the facts elicited it does seem to me that the opposition to this measure is purely fanciful, and I may even say blindly, fanatically sentimental and captious—I might say pure "moonshine," and is not based upon any proposition of law, any question of morals or ethics or any deductions from facts. To pass this bill can in no way injure the cause of temperance. In fact it is indirectly a temperance measure. If we fail to pass this bill there will be forced upon the market within the next eighteen months about 50,000,000 gallons of whisky in excess of the demand for that article. This will not only bankrupt and ruin large numbers of our citizens unnecessarily, but it will also greatly cheapen whisky and thus largely increase the consumption of the article. Viewing the question from this standpoint, I am sorry to see that our friends on the other side of this Chamber, who have always prided themselves upon an assumption of a greater degree of temperance, virtue, and holiness than their neighbors, should upon this occasion be the champions and advocates of free whisky.

I am also surprised that our Republican friends, who are endeavoring by every possible expedient to obtain a political patent upon the policy of protecting American industry, should except from the cherished industries around which they throw the great ægis of governmental aid and protection this particular traffic; and this observation applies with equal force and pertinency to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], who has enveloped himself in what he doubtless believes to be the impenetrable armor of "incidental protection." Now, gentlemen, why not be consistent? Does not the protective theory involve the right and the duty to guard, to cherish, to afford relief and aid to every established American industry? Then, why ignore this industry? It has done more in the way of furnishing revenue to the Government than any other established business. Besides, upon more than one occasion the Secretary of the Treasury extended relief to the brokers and bankers of Wall street and the business interests therewith connected, by anticipating the payment of interest and even the payment of bonds before maturity.

Here are precedents for our action and guidance. Why not follow them? Is it possible that the opposition to this bill is based upon a desire to conciliate the temperance element irrespective of the merits or the justice of the proposed legislation? Is it possible that you oppose this measure simply because the name of the article to be affected by your votes is whisky?

Why, gentlemen, such opposition is unworthy of the great statesmen and profound thinkers so many of whom are to be found on the other side. Great men do not usually waste their burning energies in a microscopic search for purely captious and sentimental objections to a measure which has for its object the relief of a number of good citizens from an impending calamity, especially when it is remembered that granting the relief in no way affects the public weal or the public Treasury. The country is just now suffering from a partial paralysis of trade, business, and commerce. Will you not increase the present industrial depression by withdrawing from the channels of trade and business $50,000,000 and locking it up in the vaults of the Treasury? Inasmuch as the Government does not need this money at this time, why is it, even as a measure of public policy, not wise and prudent to grant this extension and permit this vast amount of revenue to flow into the Treasury gradually and not disturb the business of the country by its sudden withdrawal from circulation?

This is purely a business question, and should be discussed only from a business standpoint. To pass this bill involves neither pecuniary or moral injury to the Government or people; to not pass it involves indirectly a loss of several million dollars to the Government. It being, then, simply a business measure, and involving only business considerations, the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] traveled far outside the record and the legitimate scope of the argument when he undertook to read the members of this House a temperance lecture. The gentleman [Mr. RAY] is much exercised concerning the vast quantity of grain that enters into the manufacture of distilled spirits, and he seems to think it would be wise policy to annihilate the whisky industry by national legislation, which would involve the purchasing of this grain, and with it feeding the poor and hungry.

The gentleman ought to know, if he does not, that distilled spirits will be manufactured just so long as there is a demand for them. When consumption ceases, production will end. The consumption of spirits may be a great evil, but it can not be remedied by the methods proposed by the gentleman from New York, for as long as the desire for stimulant exists the means to satisfy that desire will be found and employed; and I may say right here, that, as the desire for stimulant and its use has existed in all ages of the world, in every clime and among all races of men, it is fair to presume that the desire will continue to exist and stimulants will be used by man until time shall be no more.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] is also mistaken if he believes that the production of distilled spirits is productive of poverty. The proposition that poverty is caused by intemperance is only true in isolated instances. As a general rule intemperance is merely an incident to poverty, which is to a very large extent the result of an unequal an iniquitous distribution of wealth. If the gentleman can devise, and make operative by appropriate legislation, any plan by which the working classes can secure a just and equitable proportion of the wealth they produce, it will not be necessary for Government to buy grain to feed the poor and hungry.

But these considerations are not germane to the question and would not have been uttered had not other gentlemen gone out of their way to indulge in vituperative abuse of a legally established and lawful industry. It is the abuse and not the use of stimulants that is to be deprecated. Without stimulants the physician's skill would be seriously impaired. Alcohol has become essential to the progressive development of humanity, and it is questionable whether pain and sorrow would not increase rather than decrease if the policy of the extremists was to prevail in this particular. Intemperance of every kind is an evil. But restrictive measures will not cure it. Human perfection can only be attained through education and intelligence, and the only way to advance the cause of true temperance is to improve the material conditions—intellectual, moral, and religious status of humanity. If you are determined to refuse these men relief simply because they deal in whisky, do so; but I submit it is neither fair nor manly to abuse them for furnishing the public with an article which the public demands and insists upon having. If it is wrong to drink intoxicants as a beverage, convince the drinkers of that fact, and the production of the article for that purpose will quickly cease.

Mr. HURD. I now yield fifteen minutes to my colleague from Ohio [Mr. JORDAN].

Mr. LONG. Before the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JORDAN] proceeds, I ask that the time now at the disposal of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] be extended to the same amount as additional time was allowed to me.

Mr. JORDAN. Mr. Chairman, since I became a member of this body I have been a silent, though not an inattentive, observer of its proceedings. And I arise now to speak in support of this bill, because I would be derelict in the performance of my duty and unfaithful to the interests of my constituents if I did not do what I could to urge it upon your consideration. My colleague upon this floor [Mr. FOLLETT] and myself represent the people of Hamilton County, which includes the city of Cincinnati, and constitutes the first collection district in the State of Ohio. Embracing two Congressional districts, that collection district has paid to the Federal Government since 1862 in taxes on distilled spirits more than $100,000,000, and it now pays on this article alone a tax of $25,000 per day, $200,000 per week, $800,000 a month, or the large sum of about $10,000,000 annually. Our district stands second in the United States in the manufacture of distilled spirits, and in its holdings is perhaps equal to any other district. Sir, one-eighth of all the capital invested in the manufacturing industries of Cincinnati is invested in this business, and it yields to her citizens a gross product of $30,000,000 a year.

Our constituents, therefore, the distiller, the rectifier, the wholesale dealer, the banker, the merchant, the manufacturer, the mechanic, the laborer, all classes of our people are deeply and vitally interested in the bill now before this House. They would regard its defeat as a calamity, and would hail its passage with unfeigned delight. The Chamber of Commerce of our city have adopted resolutions upon this subject which I desire the Clerk to read and which I make part of my remarks. The Board of Transportation and all the great commercial bodies of the city have in some form or other taken similar action.

This being the case, I regard it not only as a duty, but as a high honor to give expression to their views upon this subject and to advocate their interests upon this floor.

And now, Mr. Chairman, in order that we may have an intelligent understanding of the bill now before the House, of the evils which it is intended to remedy, and the object which we seek to accomplish in its passage, let us consider the present state of the law, the hardship growing out of it, and the measure of relief extended by this bill.

Under the laws of the United States as they now stand the manufacturer of distilled spirits is required to place them as soon as made in a bonded or Government warehouse, and to pay a tax thereon of 90 cents per gallon. This tax under the law must be paid as fast as the spirits are removed from the warehouse; and, whether removed or not, the whole amount must be paid within three years from the time of its entry into the warehouse. It will thus be seen that the Government requires the manufacturer of spirits not only to pay an enormous tax—a tax of 400 per cent., a tax four times greater than the cost or intrinsic value of the article taxed—but also to pay it within three years, although he may not have sold or disposed of any of it or realized a dollar therefrom. This is a harsh law.

The object of the bill offered by Mr. WILLIS, which has been recommended by the Committee on Ways and Means, which has been approved by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and which is now under consideration, has for its sole and only object that of having the time for the payment of this tax extended two years longer.

Now, observe that by this bill it is not sought to release anybody from the payment of these taxes, nor to reduce the amount of the same, nor release the security held by the Government for its payment.

And now, Mr. Chairman, I claim that this law as it now stands is wrong in principle, unjust, unreasonable, and unfair.

This tax of 90 cents on the gallon, which is 400 per cent. in amount, and which is four times the actual or intrinsic value of the article produced, is not a tax upon property, nor upon production, but is in fact a tax upon consumption. This being so, it would seem that it would require no argument to show that the manufacturer or owner should not be required to pay the tax until the time of consumption. As it now is, he is required to advance the money and pay the tax without any reference to its consumption before it is consumed and although it may never be consumed. Under the practical operation of this law the manufacturer or owner is made to pay the tax and not the consumer. It thus requires the man who has invested a hundred thousand dollars in the manufacture of distilled spirits to invest $400,000 in order to hold them.

In 1868, when Congress was about to make the changes which were made in the internal-revenue law at that time, the Committee on Ways and Means, which had the subject under consideration, recognized the correctness of this position, and in their report to Congress said:

> The citizen ought not to be compelled to pay an excise tax upon an article which can neither be sold nor consumed. This is undoubtedly the true policy, and is in strict accordance with the principles which underlie every just system of taxation; for upon no other theory or plan can the public burdens be properly distributed among those who ought rightfully to bear them. To tax the citizen upon a particular manufactured article simply because he has manufactured it, when without fault or negligence of his he can neither sell nor consume it, is to compel him to contribute more than his just proportion toward the support of the Government. When, however, the tax is collected upon the article sold or consumed, every one who purchases or in any way uses it necessarily pays his share of the duty.

In a report made by Mr. KELLEY, in behalf of the Ways and Means Committee, in 1882, he declared that this was the true principle of all excise taxation, and "that while the Government was justifiable in exacting its revenue, it was not justifiable in attempting to control the trade in a legitimate article of commerce by forcing the owner to sell at a loss on the original cost of production or to permanently invest the amount of the tax in addition to that cost."

In the next place, this tax is unreasonable in amount. All taxes are regarded by the people as burdensome, and where taxes are levied at the usual rate of 1, 2, or 3 per cent. upon lands, property, or money, they are usually paid with difficulty; but where the tax is at the enormous rate of 400 per cent. and is required to be paid in an arbitrary period of time, so that the party paying the tax is compelled to mortgage or hypothecate his property or to sell it upon a broken market at ruinous sacrifices, then indeed it becomes a burden grievous to be borne and an exaction unworthy of a free government.

In the next place, let it be remembered, and never orgotten, that no such exaction or requirement is made by the General Government in regard to any other article of foreign importation or domestic manufacture. No such arbitrary rule exists in regard to the payment of taxes on tobacco or fermented liquor of any kind.

In the report made by Mr. KELLEY, from the Committee on Ways and Means, in 1882, on this subject, he says:

> Under the existing internal-revenue laws distilled spirits is the only article upon which the Government requires the tax to be paid before it is actually sold or removed for sale or consumption. In every other case the manufacturer keeps the article in his own possession and under his own exclusive control, without the payment of any tax, until he chooses to sell it or remove it for consumption or sale. The manufacturers of tobacco, snuff, cigars, beer, matches, perfumery, cosmetics, &c., are permitted to hold their goods until there is a consumptive demand for them, and pay the tax only when they sell.

Indeed, our own Government never required the tax to be paid within a fixed or arbitrary period of time until 1868. And the several extensions of time which have since been made show that that law was not conceived in wisdom and that it was ruinous in its operation. And when we go to foreign countries we find that no civilized Government has ever adopted any such limitation, and that England, whose excise system is the most perfect in Europe, has never required the payment of the tax upon spirits until the manufacturer saw fit to dispose of them and until they had entered into consumption, thus recognizing and carrying out the principle which I have stated, that such taxes were never intended to be paid by the manufacturer but by the consumer.

And, Mr. Chairman, what reason exists at the present time why the Government should desire to exact the payment of this money as it becomes due? Some attempt might be made to justify this course in time of war, or when the Government desired to pay its interest-bearing obligations, but none of these reasons now exist. We are not in a state of war, and there is no interest-bearing debt which it is desirable to pay. One hundred and fifty millions of money is lying idle in the Treasury. The Government derives no interest from it, and if the whole amount of tax upon this 80,000,000 gallons of spirits were to be paid to the Government to-day in advance of its maturity it would do the Government no good whatever. It would be well indeed for the Government and the people of this country if the $150,000,000 of surplus now in the Treasury could be paid into the hands of the people, so that it could enter into the business and industries of the country. These industries are to-day suffering and business is in a state of stagnation because so large an amount of money has been withdrawn from circulation. If this bill passes, this money will remain where it is for the present, and it will draw interest until it is paid, and the people will have the use of it.

What is the condition of affairs which brings this bill before Congress and makes its passage at this time at once necessary and proper? After a long period of darkness and gloom the morning broke and specie payment was resumed in the United States in the year 1879. Our people were proud, exultant, and happy. They saw their country carried safely through political and financial revolution. They saw their paper money become par with gold and silver, and that, over all doubts, speculations, and theories, specie payment had become a fixed and absolute fact.

A new impetus was given to all kinds of business. Everything seemed possible to our people. New railroads were projected and built. Large manufacturing businesses were established in all parts of the country. Every branch of industry was stimulated, and none more so than the manufacture of distilled spirits. And we find that the amount manufactured increased from 71,892,621 gallons in 1879 to 90,355,271 gallons in 1880; to 117,728,150 in 1881, and to 105,853,161 in 1882. (Since which time it rapidly decreased.) This extraordinary increase of production was unnatural and unhealthy, in excess of the legitimate growth of business, and far beyond the demands of trade. If the prosperity which seemed to dawn in 1879 had continued, had business been prosperous in all other branches and the conditions of trade generally favorable and a fair foreign demand sprung up, it might have been possible that this production of distilled spirits would have produced no serious injury to the trade; but, as events have turned out, the results have been disastrous and ruinous.

An examination of the report of the Internal Revenue Commissioner for 1883, page 123, shows that while in 1879 there was but 19,212,470 gallons of spirits in the Government warehouses, there was at the close of the fiscal year 1883 the enormous quantity of 80,499,993 gallons. The amount of the tax on this at 98 cents a gallon amounts to $72,449,993.70.

From December 1, 1883, to November, 1885, the taxes on 70,000,000 gallons will fall due and will have to be paid, unless this bill is passed. This tax is payable in monthly payments averaging a little less than $3,000,000 a month. By the 6th of July, 1884, there will be payable to the Government in taxes $26,640,038.70. The amount of distilled spirits as above shown to be on hand, and likely to be thrown on the market, has, as everybody knows, broken the market, and made it impossible to obtain money upon these goods or to make sales except at the most ruinous prices. It is a well-known fact that many persons interested in this business have been compelled to sell their whiskies at far less than their value. Sidney M. Maxwell, the superintendent of the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce, in his official report for the year 1883, says: "In many cases goods which came out of bond in 1883 have been sold by parties, unwilling to pay the tax, at lower prices than had been paid for the goods three years before. In some cases three-year-old goods have been sold at 35 to 40 cents per gallon in bond." The same thing has occurred in other cities and is now daily happening.

The holders of this 80,000,000 gallons of whisky can not pay this large amount of taxes. They have hypothecated their property; they have exhausted their credit; there is no market in which they can obtain money, and there is no purchaser for their spirits. The Government demands its tax; it asks that the bond shall be performed. The men who hold these spirits are threatened with bankruptcy; they are menaced with ruin; the accumulations of a lifetime are about to disappear; and they now ask, not that the Government shall release them of their liability, not that it shall remit or reduce any of its claims, not that it shall give up one dollar of its demands or its securities, but they ask simply for time—time to look around—time to find a market; and in order that they may get this time they offer, by this bill, to pay all that the most exacting creditor could demand—interest until the money is paid. Shylock himself could hardly have asked more.

And what is this industry which now makes this demand and urges the passage of this bill? It is a great industry, employing hundreds of millions of capital, hundreds of thousands of men; which is connected with almost every other business in the country; which in twenty years has paid to the Government $1,017,754,129, and which is now paying annually to the Goverement $75,000,000—a sum of money greater than the gross product of all the gold and silver mines of this country, a sum sufficient to pay the annual pensions of all the soldiers of all the wars in which this country has been engaged, a sum which by the year 1907 would pay off the whole interest-bearing debt of the United States, a sum which in fifteen years would amount to more than could be realized by a sale of all the lands of the United States at Government prices.

Such an industry and such a business is entitled at the hands of this Congress to fair and liberal treatment, and instead of being treated as an outlaw it should receive the fostering care and protection of the Government. And, sir, the men who are engaged in this business in this country—the manufacturer, the distiller, and the rectifier, the operator and dealer—are men as much interested in this Government, as worthy of its consideration, and as much entitled to its protection as are the men engaged in any other branch of industry in this country.

The Congress and Government of the United States have always recognized this industry as a legitimate one, and it has been made to pay more taxes than has been derived from any other business in which our people are engaged. Taxes are the price paid by the citizen to the Government for its protection, and so long as the United States continue to exact from this industry great and onerous taxes, they are bound to deal with it justly and fairly and give it as full and ample protection as is given to any other business or industry. In this matter taxation and protection should go together. This is the dictate of common sense and common honesty.

Mr. Chairman, some gentlemen who oppose this bill have suggested that if we thought this tax was oppressive why not have the law imposing the tax repealed. How many men on this floor are in favor of the repeal of the law?

Mr. STORM. I am in favor of it.

Mr. JORDAN. One single man says he is in favor of it. Very few members would be willing to vote for it now. The suggestion does not come from men who are favorable to the passage of the bill or friendly to it. It is a mere tub to the whale, a mere suggestion to lead us away from the consideration of this measure. How far has there been any attempt made in this House?

Mr. STORM. I offered a bill at the first day of the session for the repeal of the whole internal-revenue system, but it sleeps the sleep of death, which knows no waking.

Mr. JORDAN. Yes; as you might have expected. The time has not arrived for the repeal of the law. When we come to the consideration of that question many and grave questions will have to be considered. You will have to consider what is to be done with the $60,000,000 or $70,000,000 now owing to the Government for taxes on whisky in bond. What are we going to do in regard to the taxes already paid to the Government on spirits? Mr. KELLEY, who has this day talked in this House as if he favored the repeal of the internal-revenue system, has been here twenty years, and never offered a bill or made an effort looking to the repeal of that system. Mr. KELLEY uses this argument to defeat our bill, not to repeal the law.

If gentlemen mean what they say, then let them now propose to amend this bill so as to repeal the law. If they do so, they will find that there will not be twenty-five men on this floor who will vote at this time for the repeal of the internal-revenue law. Let any gentleman try it on who believes it.

Mr. YORK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JORDAN. Certainly.

Mr. YORK. If this tax is so high, why are you opposed to the repeal of the internal-revenue system?

Mr. JORDAN. I am not opposed to the repeal of the internal-revenue system, but I doubt if the time has yet arrived for it; but I say that the other side of the House is opposed to it. I dare you gentlemen to undertake now to amend this bill by proposing to repeal the internal-revenue system. There may be a man here and there may be a man there who would dare to vote for it; but there is not a single solitary Republican from Ohio who will vote for a repeal of the internal-revenue system. They will not dare to vote for a proposition that will take the tax off whisky and put it on the necessaries and the industries of life.

Mr. DUNHAM. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. JORDAN. With great pleasure.

Mr. DUNHAM. You say that this side of the House is not in favor of a repeal of the internal-revenue tax. How many on your side are in favor of it?

Mr. JORDAN. I do not think there are very many of them; I do not know how many. I will tell you who I think may be in favor of it. It is not those who say they believe the internal-revenue system is an infernal system, but those who believe that the tariff system is a celestial system of revenue. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. DUNHAM. I would like to say to the gentleman that I think he is mistaken about the opinions of gentlemen on this side of the House.

Mr. JORDAN. Why, sir, if the opinion of gentlemen on the other side is just, let my good friend make a motion to amend this bill and let us vote upon it. Let us see how many are in favor of the repeal of the internal-revenue system.

Mr. DUNHAM. Let the gentleman make it.

Mr. JORDAN. No; you should make it. You say you are in favor of it now. I am not urging it; I do not believe the time has come.

Mr. REED. One corpse at a time.

Mr. JORDAN. Yes, sir; and if that corpse comes from the other side, all right.

And now, in conclusion, allow me to say, Mr. Chairman, that this bill is neither partisan nor sectional. It has many precedents to support it, and it violates no provision of our Federal Constitution. It in no way encourages intemperance or promotes immorality. No human being will be deprived of any right by its passage, nor will the Government lose one dollar of its enormous revenue derived from this industry. This bill is correct in principle and is just and fair in all of its provisions. Pass this bill and you will give relief to a great business and industry now in danger of destruction; you will prevent the bankruptcy of thousands of our citizens, and you will have made the world understand that an American industry carried on by American citizens will always receive the fostering care and protection of an American Congress.

Mr. HURD. Mr. Chairman, in my judgment much of the opposition to this bill has arisen from a misapprehension of the nature of the law to which it relates. The discussion has been as though the extension of the bonded period was the principal feature of the bill, whereas it is only an incident. If all the relief to be afforded to the distillers under the provisions of this bill consisted merely of the extension of the bonded period they would be very much disappointed in the relief which they expect. This point will be made clear by a consideration of the history of legislation upon this subject.

In 1862 the law was first passed which provided for the imposition of taxes upon distilled spirits. The tax then was 20 cents a gallon. The spirits remained in bond until withdrawn for sale or consumption. The bonding period was indefinite. Afterward the rate of tax was increased to $2 a gallon. With the increase of taxation the temptation to fraud came; and in 1868 the great frauds upon the revenue in which were involved many distinguished people of the country attracted attention all over the United States. Then it was proposed to limit the bonded period. This was the first law proposed which took from the distiller the right to keep his whisky in bond until it was to be consumed. First the proposition was for nine months. At the expiration of nine months he was obliged to take the whisky out. Then the period was made one year, and subsequently three years, which has continued to be the period until the present day.

It was the object of those who proposed the law, as the debates in Congress indicate and clearly show, to prevent the perpetration of frauds upon the revenue. The limitation of the bonded period therefore came first, because frauds had been perpetrated upon the revenue, and with the object of preventing their recurrence. It was as though the Congress of the United States had said to the distiller, "Hitherto you have enjoyed the privilege of keeping your liquor in bond indefinitely, but because there have been frauds you shall withdraw this liquor from bond within nine months, or within one year, or within three years. You shall not have the privilege after three years to keep this liquor in bond any longer; and if you do not take it out of bond your liquor may be distrained; the condition of the bond which you have given shall be made absolute and other penalties to be found in the statutes shall be imposed upon you."

Mr. Chairman, it thus appears clearly that the limitation of the bonded period was a penalty upon the distiller, designed to prevent the commission of crime. In this view how idle it is to say that it is a question of loaning money or that the proposition of this bill is analogous to an extension of time by a creditor to his debtor. It is a question of the remission of a penalty. It is not a loan of money, nor like it, for the Government has never had this money to loan. It is not a question of the extension of time to a debtor by a creditor who suspends the operation of civil proceedings to collect his debt in order that there may be further time for its payment. But it is a question of remission and relaxation of a penalty which a criminal law imposed on distillers for the purpose of preventing fraud.

If, then, it be a question of remission of penalty, by what principles shall the action of this House be governed? Precisely the same principles which govern an executive in granting a pardon should govern a legislature in remitting or relaxing a penalty. Indeed it has been expressly decided that the legislature has the power of itself to grant a pardon unless there be an express limitation confining it exclusively to the executive department made by the fundamental law. The legislature can repeal the law which imposes the penalty, and then there is no possibility of prosecution for the offense. But as the greater includes the less, unless there be some limitation of the legislative authority the legislature can individually pardon a man who has committed a crime. How much the more, therefore, every legislature has the power to remit or relax the penalty which the law has imposed.

Mr. Chairman, it is well to remember the principles which govern legislatures in dealing with penal questions and penal laws; they are very different from those which govern in matters of private right under ordinary civil legislation. The questions when a civil law is to be enacted are: what are the pre-existing laws; have rights been established; have individuals acquired privileges and powers which the legislature has not the power to disturb? But it is not so with ordinary penal legislation. The legislature has absolute power over criminal penalties, except that it can not increase them. It can mitigate them. It can make them milder. It can repeal the law which imposed them. And the question here to-day that this House has to determine is whether this penalty which was imposed by the criminal law shall be mitigated or not.

What was the object of the penalty? It was to prevent frauds on the revenue. Have those gentlemen who are coming here for relief committed any fraud on the revenue? It is admitted, Mr. Chairman, that there has been no fraud committed, and that to-day this liquor is in the warehouses of the distillers under the control of the Government as honestly as though this law had never been passed at all. There has been no incurring of a penalty. The object for which the law was passed has been accomplished. When the object the law was intended to effectuate has been attained, shall we refuse to mitigate the penalty?

What are the principles by which this should be determined? as I inquired a moment ago. The same which govern an executive in granting pardons. There are three inquiries to be asked when an exercise of clemency is proposed: first, is it fair to the Government; second, is it just to the individual; and third, is it expedient for the community?

I say it is fair to the Government to remit this penalty, because the Government does not need this money, as the Treasury is overflowing. Not only that, it is unwise, Mr. Chairman, to increase the surplus which the Treasury contains.

It is just to these men who are engaged in this business. The proof before the Ways and Means Committee discloses and shows beyond a doubt, unless this relief be granted, that these men will be bankrupted. They can not pay this tax they are obliged to pay, as the whisky is taken out of bond under this three-years' limitation. It is just to them, because it saves them from bankruptcy.

It may be that they went into this business with their eyes open; that they knew of the three-years' limitation; but they knew it was a penalty, and they knew Congress did not love to punish, and would be just if an opportunity were afforded to it.

They are not asking to be relieved from overproduction. The same overproduction which demoralizes every other industry in the land characterizes that. The excessive supply, the diminution of price, the destruction of value, these they bear with other overproducing citizens of the United States.

What they ask is to be relieved from the penalty which the law of the United States has imposed on them, when the object which that penalty was designed to secure, the prevention of fraud on the revenue, has been accomplished. Is it expedient for the community that this should be done and that the penalty should be remitted? Mr. Chairman, this condition of the distillers is an anomalous one. Whatever is done in this case can be no precedent for another, for there is no other interest in the land so situated or so surrounded by circumstances as the distilling business is. It stands on its own bottom. It is a case entirely sui generis.

But even if it were that an example could be made and a precedent established for other cases by this legislation, I do not believe that the Government would lose anything by doing a gracious act to some of its unfortunate fellow-citizens when it does no injury to itself. Justice tempered with mercy as much becomes a government as it does an individual. No government is so strong as that which has its strength in the affections of its people. Refuse to pass this law; ruin hundreds of men; turn thousands of laborers out of employment; embarrass the business of four of the greatest cities in your land, and you need not complain, Mr. Chairman, if as a consequence you find in many sections of your country murmurings and complainings against the Government instead of loyalty and affectionate devotion to it. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Chairman, by the consent of the committee I reserved six minutes of unexpired time, at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from New York, for the occupation of which I now desire to yield the floor to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, when the discussion of this bill began, now almost a week ago, I supposed that it would be disposed of at least within a reasonable time; I had no idea at that time of asking to occupy the attention of this House for even a moment in the discussion of the subject. But this discussion has gone on for so long a time, so much of the valuable time of the House has been consumed in this debate, and the question has taken such a wide range, that I ask permission to trespass upon the patience of the House for a few moments while I state the reason why I can not support the bill and the reasons why I think it ought not to be passed.

There is, sir, important matter enough now on the Calendar of this House to occupy our full attention for a long time to come, and it seems to me that we have already given more time to the consideration of this bill than its importance justifies, and that at this date in the session we should be considering matters in which the entire nation is interested, instead of discussing day after day a question which, to my mind at least, relates to a class, and a very small class at that, and one, I may also be permitted to say, which does not appeal very strongly to my sense of sympathy.

It is well known, Mr. Chairman, that the law as it now stands imposes a tax on distilled spirits, and requires that the tax shall be paid to the Government at the expiration of three years from the time it is placed in the warehouse.

This law was well known to the distillers at the time this whisky was placed in bond. They had full knowledge of its existence and requirements. They can not plead ignorance; they understood its full force and effect. They made the whisky under the operations of that law, deliberately placed it in the bonded warehouses, knowing well the date at which the tax would accrue, and having done so, it seems to me they come now with very poor grace to this House asking an extension of the time to pay the debt that they deliberately contracted to the Government.

My distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. HURD] who has just taken his seat, in his elaborate speech in this connection, insists that this tax is in the nature of a penalty upon these distillers; that Congress demands a greater penalty, or that the manufacturers of this article incur a greater obligation to the Government, than is exacted in any other business. He seems to place it upon the ground that the distillation and bonding of whisky is in the nature of crime; that it is worse than any of the ordinary business avocations or transactions; that it is somewhat disreputable if not actually criminal, and concluded that Congress should suspend the collection of this tax for that reason.

I confess his argument seemed to me to be against the bill rather than an argument in favor of its passage. These gentlemen who own the 30,000,000 gallons of whisky now in hand, and upon which the tax will soon become due, and which it is proposed shall be excepted or relieved by the operation of this bill, deliberately incurred this obligation to the Government to pay $27,000,000 at or about this time when they placed it in bond or bought it. For them to come now and ask that they shall have two years further in which to pay this debt is neither more nor less than asking the Government of the United States to lend them $27,000,000 at 4½ per cent. interest. No sort of reasoning will avoid the force of this conclusion. The money is justly due to the Government. It was an obligation deliberately contracted at the time the whisky was made and put in bond; and they knew when they did that that the tax must be paid upon it at the time fixed by the law. I repeat, it was a deliberate contract on their part with the Government made at the time; and they have no right to ask an extension of that time unless they show good and sound reasons in their favor that do not apply to all other business transactions of the country in a similar condition.

I do not believe we have any power or right as a Congress to grant this loan. We have under the Constitution of the United States the right to borrow money; but I know of no constitutional right that we have to lend money; and I belong to that school in politics that believe there is no power intrusted in the Government that is not delegated to it by the Constitution, either directly or by necessary implication. We have no constitutional power to lend money, and no matter how our interests may be involved in it, no matter how much money we may have, we have no right to turn this Government into a great banking institution.

The argument has been used, and I think very justly, in opposition to this bill, and I think it is a sufficient reason why it should not pass that the distillers deliberately overproduced this whisky knowing the dates at which the tax would accrue, and that even two years ago, while in this House a very great demand was made that there should be an extension of the bonded period similar to this, the distillers deliberately produced nearly 50 per cent. more of this whisky in that year than could be consumed in the ordinary course of the American market. If they deliberately dug a ditch for themselves and then got into it, I do not think that should excite very much our sympathy or should be any reason why we should extricate them from the difficulties they deliberately and of their own free will brought on themselves.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I should like to have two or three minutes more.

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I am much obliged to my friend from Massachusetts.

Another view that I take of this question, and which seems to be still stronger than the argument I have just spoken of, is this: As I understand, nine-tenths of this whisky is not held by the men who made it, is not held by the distillers, but is held by gentlemen who thought they saw from the condition of the market that this whisky would rise in price, and for the purpose of making money and as a simple speculation they bought it, calculating it would rise in price. Instead of doing so it has gone down; and they now propose to avoid the result of their own business miscalculations by asking the Government to relieve them of the consequences of their own acts. Now, if there is any reason why this large amount of money should be lent to this class of men, I ask you what class of men, having been unfortunate in any sort of speculation, should be turned away if they came to borrow money of the Government at 4½ per cent.? The men who have speculated in real estate, in railroad stocks, in cotton, or in any other merchantable article would be just as much entitled to this privilege at the hands of Congress as speculators in an article which one of the friends of this bill characterized as——

> Concentrated damnation and misery, double extract of woe and perdition, a hell-broth such as witches never brewed.

And when its friends come and tell us this manufacture must be in the nature of a crime, it does not appear to me to appeal very strongly to the sympathies of this House.

There is one other point I would like to mention if I had time. The arguments that are presented in this matter are strangely inconsistent. The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means in opening this debate stated that the present law was right; that they did not complain of the law, but that they ought to be relieved from its operation. His goodness of heart and his generous nature had led him into the advocacy of what seems to me a measure which can not be defended on any sort of political principles. Other gentlemen put it on the ground that the law is all wrong; that this sort of tax should never be collected, or, if collected at all, only when the whisky goes into consumption. I have not time to undertake to follow those arguments out. One of the leading friends of the measure tells us that this is a matter between the Government and individuals; that it is like a matter between an ordinary debtor and creditor; that exactly the same sentiments of humanity should move us in this matter that a private creditor would feel to give an extension of time to his debtor. On the other hand, my distinguished friend from Ohio says there is no similarity between these cases. Yet all these gentlemen with all these diverging views arrive at the same point, and insist that we ought to extend this period.

The fact is that if this law is right it ought to be enforced. If wrong it ought to be repealed. Suspension is not a remedy in either case. If the law is as it ought to be it ought to be carried out. If it is not as it ought to be, suspension will not do any good. General Grant never said a wiser thing in his life than when he said the best way to repeal a bad law was to enforce it. In that view the proper course to take in this, as in all similar cases, is to let the law be enforced, and then such remedies as are natural and right will follow in their due order.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, let me say I regard this as an ultra effort at the exercise of something like paternal authority. It seems to me it can not be defended in any sort of view, looking at it from the political standpoint from which I have always been accustomed to look at such matters. For these and a number of other reasons which I have not time to present I am opposed to this bill.

Mr. RUSSELL. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED. After the very able and exhaustive argument and presentation of this case by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] it hardly seems necessary for any one to say anything more. Yet, rather for my own satisfaction than for any better reason, I feel called upon to insist in a more specific and definite manner than I have been able to heretofore upon one aspect of this case.

The friends of this measure put their advocacy of it upon very singular and very divergent grounds. A gentleman from one part of Ohio [Mr. FORAN] claims that we should treat these distillers fairly because they are engaged in an honorable business. His colleague from the other end of the State of Ohio [Mr. HURD] tells us that we should treat these men fairly because they come before us attacked by criminal penalties, from which we ought to relieve them, upon the ground that upon the whole they have behaved pretty well. I leave it to those gentlemen, colleagues, to reconcile between themselves this divergence of argument.

For my part, I am willing to treat this question without reference to either ground. I am willing to treat it without any prejudice, and to look at it solely in view of its effects upon the business interests of the country. There has been one argument in favor of this bill which, if true and sound in all its parts, ought to induce the House to listen to its advocates. That is the declaration that if this tax of $70,000,000, or rather the tax on 70,000,000 gallons of whisky, is exacted during the next two years financial disaster will fall upon the country, and we will realize all the pictures of ruin with which gentlemen have adorned their speeches. If that be true, and there be nothing else true in modification of that, then there might be reason for the consideration of this question which is demanded.

But if gentlemen will look forward they can see as the result of this legislation a more enormous disaster than can possibly result from our refusal to pass this bill, even if their prognostications be true. Human nature during the next two years is going to be the same as human nature has been during the last three years. If you allow these distillers to store their whisky in Government warehouses for two years longer, without taking it out and putting it upon the market, the men who to-day have distilleries in their ownership and possession will be obliged by the laws of human nature to manufacture whisky in excess of the amount of consumption in the country.

And the result will be that at the end of the next two years, if this bill shall pass, those who are engaged in this business will be called upon not merely to raise enough to pay the tax on 70,000,000 gallons, but enough to pay the tax on 100,000,000 gallons. As I said the other day, if it be true that disaster will follow upon the payment of the tax on 70,000,000 gallons, what will be the result of paying the tax on 100,000,000 gallons? Is this a fancy picture, or is it justified by the facts? Is it a priori reasoning, or does history bear me out in what I say?

Mark these figures; they have been repeated a dozen times in this debate, but I do not think their full significance has been exhausted: In the year 1878, 56,000,000 gallons of whisky were manufactured. On the 1st day of March an extension of one year was given. What was the result? That very year the production leaped from 56,000,000 to 71,000,000 gallons.

Then, on the 28th day of May, 1880, a three years' extension was given, and the production leaped from 71,000,000 to 90,000,000, the next year to 100,000,000, and the year after to 117,000,000 gallons. These results are not and were not unknown to the distillers of the country. There is no other business where the statistics are so exact, where everybody for the mere looking can find out just what is the production of the article all over the country at any moment.

pire, and they would then be called upon to pay the tax. What was the result? The production was reduced in 1882 to 105,000,000 of gallons and in 1883 it was reduced to 74,000,000 of gallons. Now, if you will let this matter alone, the production will come down to 56,000,000, the normal consumption of the country. If you do not, but grant this extension of time, then instead of having to face the problem of the tax on 70,000,000 of gallons, you will have to face it on 100,000,000 of gallons. The result will be either a repeal of the tax or disaster will follow.

It seems to me that there is the whole business in a nutshell. If we go on with the law as it now is there will be no disaster. What are all these prognostications worth? Can not gentlemen recollect that one year ago the distillers were howling around Congress proclaiming that unless a bill for the extension of the bonded period was then passed the next year would see ruin overwhelm us all? Has it come? Their prophecies in every instance have proved to be erroneous.

We can see that there will be greater disaster if we follow their advice. We followed it in the one-year extension and in the three years' extension, and the result was very bad. Shall we continue to follow the advice of men whose predictions history has proved to be without foundation?

The committee rose informally; and Mr. ELLIS took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed and requested the concurrence of the House in a bill and joint resolution of the following titles:

A bill (S. 1852) fixing the salaries of the several judges of the United States district courts at $5,000 per annum, and for other purposes; and Joint resolution (S. R. 32) providing for the payment of laborers in Government employ for certain holidays.

BONDED-WHISKY BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HATCH] for five minutes.

Mr. HATCH, of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, after the very thorough discussion which this measure has received at the hands of the Committee of the Whole it would be unpardonable for one who had not made it a more careful study than I have to detain the committee for any great length of time.

This measure, if I understand it, is a proposition that the Government shall loan $66,000,000; that the Government shall loan these $66,000,000 at the rate of 4½ per cent. interest for a period of two years; that the Government shall not only loan this sum at this rate, but shall loan it to whisky dealers, to men engaged in the whisky traffic; that it shall loan this vast sum of money at this rate to this class of our business community, but shall loan it upon the security of a bond and the pledge of the whisky.

Now, for a moment consider each element of this proposition. First, that the Government shall loan money. Is that one of the functions of our Government? Does it belong to the policy or the purpose of its creation that it shall go into the business of lending money at any time to any class of people?

This view of the case, however, has been sufficiently commented upon. But a further proposition is that the Government shall loan this sum at 4½ per cent. interest. Can any other class of business men to-day, with your banks overrunning with money, go into the market and upon a bond or a pledge of personal property as security borrow money for two years at 4½ per cent. interest? Where money is loaned upon long time business men require real-estate security. They do not accept personal credit for a loan of money for two years. But that is this proposition.

Further than that, the proposition is that we shall loan this money to people engaged in the whisky traffic. The first gentleman, I think, or the second, perhaps, who advocated this bill before the Committee of the Whole said that this liquor is not now the property of the manufacturers but has passed into the hands of middle-men, is now the property of orphans and widows. I can appreciate the necessities of a manufacturer who finds his large plant perhaps standing idle, who will lose whether he continues his business or whether he suspends it, being pressed by the emergency to continue to manufacture even upon a falling market. But what possible excuse is there for one to lend his money under such circumstances? Here these people, it is said orphans, widows, and bankers, have loaned their money upon this property as a pledge. They did it under no pressure of circumstances; they did it voluntarily.

But what sort of a proposition is this? That the Government of the United States shall loan money to dealers in whisky to be carried across the Alleghany Mountains into the States of Ohio, Michigan, and Iowa. Is it not known to the members of this House that never in the history of the Northwest were the excitement and interest in regard to the temperance question so great as at this time? What has been the recent history of legislation in Ohio? What in Iowa? This very winter a prohibitory statute has been passed. So in Kansas and in my own State of Michigan. Never in the history of the State were temperance organizations so ardent, so well knit together, so determined as they are now.

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. DINGLEY addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. RUSSELL. I now yield for ten minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE].

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, this question has been so fully presented that to argue it further would be mere repetition; but I wish to submit a few thoughts only.

The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] admits that whisky is the fruitful source of crime and distress, and he would "regulate" it, and he would leave the task of regulating it to the States. Could the States regulate it in the Territories or in the District of Columbia? Most certainly not. Therefore he would leave the citizens of the District of Columbia and the Territories unprotected by any regulation. He says the execution of the internal-revenue law costs the nation ten millions annually, and therefore should be repealed. He fails to tell us that the liquor traffic costs the nation annually $800,000,000.

"Repeal the law and then we will have money enough for all purposes," says the same gentleman. I confess that I have no sympathy with the Pennsylvania policy which would pare down our revenues so far that we would have no sum with which to reduce the national debt, no sum with which to care for the old and broken-down soldiers of the Republic and their widows and orphans; no sympathy with or admiration for a financial scheme that would "protect" the manufacturer and leave the workingman unprotected from every trade, profession, or occupation, the inevitable tendency of which is to make him less self-respecting as a man, less independent as a citizen, or less intelligent as a voter. Besides, the conviction has forced itself upon the minds of myself and many others of this House that procrastination means eventual avoidance of the whole tax. This has become evident from the utterances of most of the advocates of the bill and by the utterances of some gentlemen who are opposed to it.

This is not the only item of commerce which is more or less injured by overproduction. The lumber business has become seriously depressed from this cause. Yet it does not come here whining for relief by special legislation. But the cases are dissimilar in this: the lumber product reaches the consumer to bless, while this goes to the consumer to curse.

This petted, pampered pirate comes asking alms, when in all its nefarious history it was never known to confer a blessing on a man, a State, or a nation. It asks to be selected from the whole multitude of business enterprises and placed above and beyond all the others as a recipient of public favor, in the face of the fact that it has been the deadliest and direst foe that the public has ever had to deal with.

Its advocates claim this remarkable concession because it pays annually a tax of near $100,000,000, but they would have us forget that it destroys grain enough to feed all the starving sons of earth; that it lowers the standard of public virtue, debases the public conscience, lowers the standard of citizenship, slimes its wicked way up to the seat of political power, destroys the high standard of intelligence and the nice sense of virtue so essential among a people every one of whom is a voter and thereby a ruler. They would have us forget that wherever its sway is recognized it has desolated homes, beggared its votaries, and physically, mentally, and morally dragged down and degraded its victims. They would have us forget that to-day, while we talk, all over this fair land its victims are suffering, starving, dying. They would have us forget that for every dollar which it pays to support Government the legitimate industries and wealth of the country are taxed tenfold the sum thus realized to overcome or correct the costs of its destructive influences upon our people. They would have us forget that, financially considered, this branch of commerce has always been and must always and inevitably be a failure. They would have us forget that this business has always been a lawbreaker when it has been unable to buy such laws or lawmakers as suited its purposes.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] pleads for the passage of the bill because of $150,000,000 in the Treasury for which there is no use. If the gentleman wishes to put in circulation our surplus, I will cheerfully join him in that; but is it not more judicious, more patriotic, more sensible to apply that surplus to a reduction of the public debt? Or, better still, take that $150,000,000, add to it the sum now due and to become due from whisky of $70,000,000; put with these sums the $100,000,000 due from the Pacific railroads, and pension every Union soldier, without whose self-sacrificing devotion to the Union we to-day would have no surplus revenue or revenue at all—no Treasury, no Congress, no flag, no country!

But the opponents of this bill are charged with being "narrow-minded" and "cranky." If to legislate justly for the personal and political good of the American people is an evidence of crankism, then I glory in being a "crank." The men who make these charges would have pronounced General Washington and He who "went about doing good" both cranks.

I understood the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON] to say he never knew one of these temperance cranks but would "go behind the door and take a drink." I can not dispute him; I believe him; and my only regret is that it has been his misfortune to have only associated with or made the acquaintance of the insincere and the unworthy, and will do my unfortunate friend the kindness to inform him that there are heights he has not climbed, realms of moral excellence he has not explored, and that if he will abandon the attitude of standing as the apologist of a trade that degrades, debauches, demoralizes, and damns everything it touches, he may thereby lift himself to the right of association with men whose patriotism would lead them to legislate for the "greatest good to the greatest number," whose philanthropy would impel them to reach down to the gutter and lift their weaker brother from the degradation to which he has been brought by commerce in whisky, and place him on the broader, purer platform of an independent manhood; men the purity of whose lives and conduct and their life-long devotion to principle enable them to regard pityingly the men who charge them with insincerity.

This monster for which they plead was conceived in sin, born in corruption, and reared in iniquity. Its lullaby has been the sigh of the suffering, the yell of the maniac, the groan of the murdered; and its requiem shall be the clearly expressed and indignant protest of all respectable people against its longer existence.

Mr. RUSSELL. I now yield the remainder of the time to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN].

Mr. BLACKBURN. I yield twenty minutes, or so much of the time as remains, to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON].

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty minutes of the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts yet remains.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the discussion of this question, and I find myself measurably in the same position as the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG]. The difference, as I understand, in the outset between the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts and myself is this: that he came to the consideration of the question inclined to vote for this bill but now finds himself, either by the force of his own or somebody else's argument, opposed to it, while I was originally opposed to the bill. I thought perhaps it was not wise; I have not been convinced by the argument of my distinguished friend from Massachusetts to such an extent as to remain in that category. On the contrary, it strikes me that this is a wise measure, a proper measure, a business measure, and should command our support.

Right here, sir, I want to say a word. I shall not indulge here to-day in these twenty minutes in any facetious remarks about feeble or infant industries, nor will I venture to say anything about robbing the poor laboring man. I regret very much that my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. COX] should have seen fit to interject into this discussion a speech of two hours that in my judgment wise statesmanship would have avoided. This is not a discussion upon the tariff—it is a discussion upon an internal-revenue measure; and though the custom may be for men to go outside and lug into the debate here on the floor of the House what belongs to other questions, I beg to say, Mr. Chairman, that it is a custom more honored in the breach than in the observance. Therefore, I would have said to my distinguished friend, in whose grand speech I was very much interested—I would have said to him that he ought to have saved himself the expression that the friends of this bill would scorn to take it if it was to be given to them by those who are in favor of protection. The House is not discussing the question of protection yet nor the question of the tariff. When that comes before the House doubtless very many men will be heard. But the theory of my friend from Arkansas, like the bill of my distinguished friend the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, has not been quite sufficiently well considered, because that bill if it ever becomes a law will increase the surplus in the Treasury and not decrease it. However, I am not to be drawn into a discussion of that character [laughter], although it is pretty hard when a man is pushed that he will not retort.

Now, Mr. Chairman, to begin with my argument, I stated that I should vote for the passage of this bill. I shall vote for it with an amendment of this character, and I suppose such an amendment will be offered by my friend from New York [Mr. POTTER]. If such an amendment is adopted I will vote for the bill.

At the proper point then in the bill, if he fails to offer the amendment, I shall offer this:

And also interest on such tax at the rate of 4½ per cent. per annum, payable quarterly in advance, for the time of such extension.

I said, sir, that this was a business question, not a sentimental question. It is not a question to carry the groundlings, but a business question; and being a business question, I ask the House to impose upon gentlemen who come here begging this business favor a business proposition of 4½ per cent. per annum for the privilege. I mean business; and if they ask a stay of the proceedings at the hands of the Government of the United States, then I, as one of the Representatives on this floor, ask that they pay 4½ per cent. per annum quarterly in advance for that privilege. Therefore in whatever I may say theoretically of this bill, and I shall be very brief—whatever I may have to say in favor of the bill will be with the understanding that this amendment must be adopted or I shall not vote for it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say one word to my distinguished friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG], and I confess that I am surprised, absolutely surprised, at the position which he has assumed in a carefully studied and elaborate speech. If he had risen on this floor, as I have risen, and as other gentlemen have done, without any idea of delivering a carefully prepared address, and had suggested that this was a loan on the part of the Government, I would not be surprised. If he had said in a hasty speech on this question that it was unconstitutional, I would not have been surprised. Why, sir, what does he mean by loan? A loan of money that the Government has not and may never have? For to-morrow every dollar's worth of that whisky is subject to exportation. It is not a loan. In no sense of the word is it a loan.

I do not take precisely the view, either, that was taken by my friend from Ohio [Mr. HURD]. He called it a penalty to put this tax upon the whisky distiller or the corn-grower. But it is not a loan. The money is not in the hands of the Government. The money may never be in the hands of the Government. The article might all be exported. In no sense can any gentleman call it a loan. It is a stay of proceedings, and nothing else. And if these men will pay 4½ per cent. per annum for that stay of proceedings I propose for one to grant it.

Anti-constitutional, is it? I caught the eye of my friend from Massachusetts in a half smile when he suggested that the Constitution-lovers ought to be very careful before they voted for this bill opposed to the Constitution of the United States! When the same thing has been done for a hundred years and no wise man has stood up on the floor of this House or the other branch of the Federal Legislature and talked about the Constitution. Why import a million dollars' worth of goods to-morrow from Europe and put them in bond? I want an extension. I get my extension; only not two years—three years. And this is opposed to the Constitution! It may be opposed to the constitution of the gentleman from Massachusetts, but it is not opposed to the Constitution of the United States. There is nothing in it. I will give away part of my time if any man will undertake to show why this is unconstitutional. I would like to hear it.

Ever since there has been any commerce between this country and other countries, ever since the formation of the Federal Government, this same principle has been adopted, and there has been nobody so wise as to say it was in defiance of the Constitution.

A loan of what the Government does not possess and may never possess, and yet it is a loan! It is a business proposition that these gentlemen make to us. They say: "We have paid you within the last fifteen or twenty years a thousand million dollars and more." But, says my friend from Massachusetts, "They have not paid it. It was the people, the consumers, who paid it." That is true. That is true in all cases of this character. But at first these men pay it that take the article out of bond. They assume that it will be used; therefore they advance and pay the amount. And I say in the last fifteen years, or a little more, they have paid more than one thousand million dollars, two-thirds of the amount of the interest-bearing debt of the United States to-day. And they come here now and ask you to do what? To extend this time. That is all. They pay you for it. A million dollars in the shape of interest go into the Federal Treasury if this time is extended. If I vote for the bill it is upon that condition, and under no other circumstances will I vote for it. And this is a loan, is it? A mere stay of proceedings a loan!

Mr. COOK. A stay of execution.

Mr. LONG. What is the 4½ per cent. interest payable for?

Mr. EATON. Because I propose to make a good business transaction for the United States if I vote for this bill—that is what it is paying for. I suppose with a tolerable amount of mathematical knowledge it can be ascertained what that will amount to.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Did you ever hear of paying interest on a stay of proceedings?

Mr. EATON. You can call it a loan if you like, and then call it paying interest on a loan. I call it a stay of proceedings; and in order to stay proceedings they must pay interest upon the amount of money involved, not because the money has been taken.

Now, Mr. Chairman, another word. I think my friend from Pennsylvania called this an infernal tax—I allude to the Nestor of the House. If I heard him correctly he called this an infernal tax. What did he mean by that? He meant that it was a tax not opposed to the Constitution of the United States, if you please, but opposed to the custom and usage of the United States. Jefferson called all such taxes infernal taxes.

Now here are a set of people who have paid this vast amount of money into the Treasury upon an unwarrantable tax, to say the least—a harsh tax, to say the least—a tax four times larger than the value of the article taxed. And they ask you now to save them from ruin by permitting this tax to remain. They ask a stay of proceedings for a short term longer. Why, where is the gentleman in his private business that would not do it? Let me ask my distinguished friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG], who I know has a human heart in his bosom, supposing any man had been in business and had purchased of him as a merchant in the last fifteen years $100,000 worth of goods and he bought a little paltry bill of $500 and his necessities prevented his paying that bill, but he said to my friend from Massachusetts, "You have made more than $20,000 out of me as your customer; won't you give me time on this little paltry $500?" Would not my friend from Massachusetts say, "Time! yes, take all you want; take all you desire. You have been my good customer; I will be your good friend." And there is just that difference between $100,000 and $500 in this very bill. And yet what you would do individually you refuse to do here for this great interest, this legitimate interest of a large portion of the people of the United States.

Why, Mr. Chairman, there ought not to be one moment's hesitation. Our rule should be in a case of this matter, "Do as we would be done by." Is there anything in the laws, in the Government, and in the Constitution of the United States that prevents such action as this upon our part? If there be, what is it, where is it, and how is it?

Sir, I am opposed to this whole revenue tax and always have been. I will vote with my friend from Pennsylvania to-morrow to strike it from the list. I do not believe in this mode of carrying on the Government of the United States. But if there be a sentiment—and I do not use the word offensively—if there be a sentiment abroad that this can afford and ought to pay a large tax, then let us strike down the tax on tobacco and on spirits distilled from fruits, and thus save to the Government and to the people nearly $40,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. EATON. I would like a minute or two more.

Mr. BLACKBURN. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. EATON. Only a few moments.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will five minutes more do?

Mr. EATON. Yes.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. EATON. The fact that I am opposed to the internal-revenue system of taxation, the fact that to-morrow I would vote to throw off the tax on whisky and the tax on tobacco both, has nothing to do with this bill. I find this bill here before us; the other proposition is not here. Therefore, so far as I may, as a representative of the people, I will grant what these gentlemen request. No harm can come of it; none at all.

On the contrary, let me say to the prophets who have spoken on the other side of this House, that when you put on this 4½ per cent. tax, payable quarterly in advance, it will tend to prevent the distillation of this article, for they will have to pay this additional tax if they distill and put in bond. I think they will not do it; I hope it will have that effect, and I believe it will. It will tend to prevent in a certain degree, not to any very great degree perhaps, but in a certain degree, the accumulation of this article in Government warehouses. That is one of the reasons why I shall offer such an amendment and hope it may be unanimously adopted.

I hope every gentleman will look at this proposition deliberately and quietly as a matter of business. As I have already said, when I first took up this bill I was indisposed to support it under any circumstances. But the more I examined it, the more I heard in regard to the condition of these people, the more ready I became to adopt the course which I have concluded to take.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question on his amendment?

Mr. EATON. With great pleasure.

Mr. DUNN. You propose to collect this interest quarterly in advance?

Mr. EATON. Yes.

Mr. DUNN. I understand you to take the ground that no sum of money is loaned to anybody.

Mr. EATON. I do.

Mr. DUNN. Nothing is due or owing to the Government?

Mr. EATON. No.

Mr. DUNN. Then what will you take interest upon?

Mr. EATON. When they put it in the warehouse you will get interest on it. Do you not know what it is?

Mr. DUNN. I think I do; but I want to reconcile your amendment with your theory of the bill.

Mr. EATON. I want to answer the gentleman. When you bring 1,000,000 gallons of whisky upon which there is a certain tax, that is a matter of figures.

Mr. DUNN. Tax due or to become due?

Mr. EATON. It does not matter what. When you bring that million of gallons of whisky there you will pay quarterly in advance 4½ per cent. on the amount of the tax.

Mr. DUNN. On what these parties owe the Government?

Mr. EATON. You may call it what they owe the Government, if you like.

Mr. DUNN. And therefore it is on what the Government loans to them for a length of time.

Mr. EATON. If you choose to stick there in the bark, I can not help it. [Laughter]. You know what I mean, and I know what you mean exactly. You mean that money which is not advanced is a loan, and I say it can not be. It is not in the nature of the case that it can be a loan. In one sense we agree. We agree that there is $50,000,000 upon which it is proposed that there shall be a stay of proceedings. We agree that if the United States demands the payment of that amount it will then be $50,000,000 richer, or it will have to take the whisky and confiscate it. I agree to all that. There is no doubt about it. But when you talk about a loan, to me that is an absurdity; it can not be a loan.

Mr. DUNN. Can this whisky be withdrawn and exported after this extension bond is given?

Mr. EATON. Why not?

Mr. DUNN. Can it be?

Mr. EATON. Why not?

Mr. DUNN. I ask you, can it?

Mr. EATON. I answer the gentleman very frankly that I have not examined with reference to that question. But I beg to say to him that if it is withdrawn I will take the 4½ per cent. interest and you do not get it back. [Laughter.] That is a pretty good specimen of a Yankee's mode of doing business. [Renewed laughter.] If I get the 4½ per cent. into my hands and then these distillers choose to withdraw the whisky and export it, very well; the Government is just so much the bette roff by the operation. Is my friend satisfied with the answer I have given him?

Mr. DUNN. I have no doubt the gentleman is perfectly satisfied with his own answer.

Mr. EATON. Of course I am perfectly satisfied with my own answer, because in my judgment no sensible man could give any other answer. [Great laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] has expired.

Mr. EATON. I thank the gentlemen of the Committee of the Whole for their courtesy in extending my time.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DORSHEIMER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5265) to extend the time for the payment of the tax on distilled spirits now in warehouse, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. ELLIS. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion for a few moments.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will withdraw the motion.

RELIEF OF SUFFERERS BY FLOOD.

Mr. ELLIS. I ask consent to report from the Committee on Appropriations a joint resolution for consideration at this time. I will state, with the permission of the House, that this resolution has been prepared and sent here by the Secretary of War, and does not involve a dollar of additional expense. It simply reappropriates money already appropriated, but not expended, for the relief of certain sufferers.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution, after which there will be opportunity for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution reappropriating the sum of $125,000, not expended, for the relief of sufferers by the floods of the Mississippi River.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That so much of the appropriation for the relief of sufferers by the overflow of the Ohio River and its tributaries as remains unexpended, not exceeding the sum of $125,000, may be used by the Secretary of War in the purchase and distribution of subsistence stores and payment for necessary transportation to aid in the relief of destitute persons in the district overflowed by the Mississippi River and its tributaries; and he is authorized to co-operate with the authorities of the several States of which such district is a part in making distribution of supplies.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. ELLIS. Unless there is objection I will move the previous question.

Mr. DUNN. Before I consent to the introduction of this resolution I want to know——

Mr. DUNHAM. I object.

Mr. ELLIS. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DUNHAM] that this money has already been appropriated for the relief of sufferers by the flood on the Ohio; that the Secretary of War found it unnecessary to expend the whole sum appropriated; that there is a balance of $125,000, and the Secretary of War has transmitted to the House this resolution providing that this balance shall go to the relief of starving people on the Mississippi River. That is the whole effect of the resolution.

Mr. DUNHAM. As I understand, it is proposed to use for this purpose money previously appropriated for sufferers by overflow.

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. DUNHAM. Now, what certainty is there, if this money be taken, that these parties may not come back here within a week for another appropriation? That is the only objection I have. If I were satisfied on that question I would withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the Chair will lay before the House a communication from the Secretary of War on this subject.

There being no objection, the Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, March 25, 1884.

In further response to the resolution of the House of Representatives adopted March 5, 1884, in which the Secretary of War was requested to furnish the House from time to time with information of the progress of the floods in the valley of the Mississippi, and report if at any time in his judgment there exists such suffering in consequence of said floods as to justify measures of relief on the part of Congress, and if so, the measure of such relief, the Secretary of War has the honor to inform the House of Representatives that from official reports received by him it appears that the floods in the Mississippi Valley from the neighborhood of Vicksburg down to New Orleans are now higher than the highest point reached in the year 1882, and that large numbers of people have by the overflowing of agricultural districts been made unable to help themselves.

In accordance with the request contained in the resolution he has the honor to suggest that if it be the pleasure of Congress to authorize the distribution of subsistence supplies to those rendered destitute by the floods, he in the first instance be authorized to expend for the purpose an amount not exceeding $125,000 out of the unexpended balance of the sums appropriated for the relief of those rendered destitute by the floods of the Ohio River and its tributaries.

ROBERT T. LINCOLN, Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this resolution?

Mr. DUNN. I desire some more information before I yield my consent. I infer from the reading of that letter and from the phraseology of the resolution that this expenditure is to apply only to the country from Vicksburg down.

Mr. KEIFER and others. Oh, no.

Mr. DUNN. That is certainly the purport of the communication from the Secretary of War; and the language of the resolution is ambiguous. I desire that it be read again.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be again read.

The Clerk again read the resolution.

Mr. ELLIS. There is nothing ambiguous in the resolution. It applies to all sufferers alike.

Mr. LAIRD. Is the gentleman sufficiently advised now to say that this sum will be adequate for the relief of these people?

Mr. ELLIS. No, sir; I can not tell that. I do not know. This whole matter was committed by resolution of the House to the discretion of the Secretary of War, and this is his first report.

Mr. RICE. This whole matter was committed yesterday to the Committee on Appropriations. I object.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. This comes from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ELLIS. If my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. RICE] will give me his attention, I will state that this is an entirely different resolution from that presented by me yesterday. This is a resolution prepared by the Secretary of War and transmitted to the Committee on Appropriations this morning, and by the committee unanimously reported to the House.

Mr. RICE. Who reports the resolution?

Mr. ELLIS. I report the resolution under instructions from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Unanimously.

Mr. DUNN. I want it understood that I yield my assent to this measure with the distinct understanding that it is for the relief of all persons rendered destitute by the floods of that river from one end to the other.

Mr. ELLIS. Who has proposed to curtail or limit it? Who in the committee or on the floor of the House has proposed to make it partial? It is universal. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN], if he understands the English language, must see that the resolution makes the expenditure universal in its application.

Mr. DUNN. I understand the English language and I understand actions also. When I sent communications to the Secretary of War and to the Committee on Appropriations, representing the river was above the highest water mark in Arkansas, the appeal was rejected.

Mr. ELLIS. Not at all.

Mr. DUNN. The monkeys never squealed until this flood hit Louisiana.

Mr. ELLIS. The monkey has been squealing before there was any demand for relief.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WELLER. I object. There is too much confusion here. I would suggest that no harm will be done if this be allowed to go over until to-morrow or next day.

Mr. ELLIS. I send to the Clerk's desk to have read——

The SPEAKER. The resolution is not before the House.

Mr. WELLER. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. YORK. I renew it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. KEIFER. Let me introduce a bill for reference.

Mr. BLACKBURN. If I yield at all I must yield to others around me who have prior requests.

Mr. BLACKBURN's motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

---

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 26, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

Mr. SHERMAN took the chair as presiding officer, under the designation made by the President pro tempore on Friday last, with the unanimous consent of the Senate.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHERMAN in the chair) laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the 27th ultimo, information in regard to leases of any part of the Crow Indian reservation, in Montana, for grazing purposes; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LAPHAM. I present a memorial of citizens of New York, remonstrating against the passage of the bill to regulate actions against purchasers of patented articles. The bill having been reported from the Committee on Patents, I move that the memorial lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON presented a preamble and resolutions adopted by the Thomas Bunch Post, No. 259, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Indiana, in favor of certain measures pending in Congress for the relief of soldiers; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DAWES. I present the petition of the mayor of the city of Holyoke, in Massachusetts, pastors of churches in that city, and other leading people residing there, praying for legislation in the interest of Indian education. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I present a petition of the Independent Reformed Episcopal Church of the United States, signed by the presiding bishop of that Church and the leading members of it throughout the United States to the number, I am informed, of 15,000. It is in behalf of a new policy for the Indians, and they pray—first, that there may be secured to them lands in severalty with fee-simple titles, inalienable for thirty years; that they shall have the same law protection, legal personalty, and citizenship that white men and black men enjoy, with adequate common-school and industrial education upon their present reservations, and full religious liberty.

I desire to say that the bill now before the Senate in the morning hour embraces almost everything asked for in this petition, and I may be permitted, I think, by the Senate to assure these petitioners that there is every evidence that the Senate is responsive to their prayer; that the bill securing substantially these rights to the Indians passed this body at its last session unanimously, and that it is now before the Senate with such evidence of support as may lead these petitioners to believe that so far as this body is concerned it will substantially carry out their views.

I felt at liberty to say so much, as the bill before the Senate is a matter framed very much in the spirit of this petition. I thought perhaps it was due as well to the character of these petitioners as to the prevailing sentiment of the Senate that they might be assured that the Senate itself was not indifferent to the subject-matter of the prayer of the petition.

As the bill is before the Senate, I do not think it necessary that the petition should be referred to any committee, but it should be laid on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The petition will lie on the table.

Mr. BUTLER. I present the petition of the Rev. Lionel C. Joell, E. D. Spearman, and 60 other citizens of Greenwood, county of Abbeville, South Carolina, praying that an appropriation be made for the removal of illiteracy in the South. Inasmuch as the bill in relation to that subject is now before the Senate, I move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

He also presented a petition of ex-Union soldiers of New York city, praying for an increase of pensions; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a communication from General M. C. Meigs, of Washington, D. C., remonstrating against the third section of the naval appropriation bill, which forbids an officer on the retired-list of the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps to hold position in the civil service or other employ of the Government and draw the compensation or salary thereof together with his pay as such retired officer; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a petition of Marion Post, No. 119, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Missouri, at Stanberry, Mo.; a petition of A. N. Goldwood Post, No. 104, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Ohio, of Richfield, Ohio; and a petition of Monroe Post, No. 357, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Ohio, of Sedan, Ohio, praying for the granting of one hundred and sixty acres of land to each honorably discharged soldier; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. GORMAN. I present a memorial of the Society of Friends in Baltimore. It relates to Senate bill No. 398, now pending before the Senate, known as the educational bill. I desire to state that the Society of Friends in Baltimore have by private subscription raised in the past few years over $200,000 to aid in the education of the illiterates of the South. It is a very important body, and I desire that the memorial may be read.

The memorial was read, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

The representatives of the "Society of Friends" residing in the States of Maryland and Virginia respectfully state that they have for the past fifteen years been engaged in promoting the education of and establishing schools among the children of all classes in several of the Southern States. They have therefore taken the deepest interest in the Senate bill No. 398, now pending before Congress, entitled "A bill to aid in the establishment of temporary support of common schools," as amended January 31, 1884, and would respectfully urge the importance of the proposed legislation.

On behalf of Baltimore Yearly Meeting of Friends.

I also submit a report in writing expressing the views of the committee in reference to that country and its political situation, and a recommendation to the Committee on Appropriations to be referred to the Committee on Appropriations for an amendment of the bill relating to the consular and diplomatic service so as to provide the sum of $50,000 to enable the President to send diplomatic or commercial agents into that country.

I move that the resolutions be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator ask action on the report?

Mr. MORGAN. I ask that the recommendation of the Committee on Foreign Relations be referred to the Committee on Appropriations; and I desire to say in this connection that at some future day by instruction of the Committee on Foreign Relations I shall bring to the attention of the Senate a resolution still further relating to this question.

Mr. DOLPH. I am directed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Charles and Jacob Schneider, praying compensation for wood cut from their land in Knox County, Tennessee, to report adversely thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proper direction, the Chair supposes, is that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition. That order will be entered, if there be no objection.

Joint resolution (S. R. 64) providing for the addition of $10,000 to the contingent fund of the Senate.

LANDS IN SEVERALTY TO INDIANS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The morning business being closed, the next business is the Calendar of cases not objected to, under Rule VIII. The first in order is the bill to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians, which was under consideration yesterday morning.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 48) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the States and Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. DOLPH.

Mr. DOLPH. It was suggested yesterday by the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs [Mr. DAWES] that the purpose of the amendment proposed by me was not objectionable, but the form was not in accordance with the present practice of the Government; and, acting upon his suggestion that as the bill would go over until this morning I should revise my amendment, I have drawn what I suppose to be in accordance with the views of the committee, which I submit as a substitute for the amendment offered by me yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon modifies his amendment. The modification will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out, in section 6, after the word "Congress," in line 40, the words "and the moneys agreed to be paid shall be appropriated and paid to said tribe or invested for its benefit, as the case may be" and insert:

> And the principal of all sums agreed to be paid by the United States as the purchase price of any portion of any such reservation shall be payable only to the Indians or Indian tribe from whom such purchase was made by express authority of Congress after the expiration of twenty-five years from the purchase of said lands; but the same shall in the mean time be placed in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the tribe or tribes of Indians entitled thereto, and in the mean time, and until such principal sum shall be paid over to or expended for the benefit of said Indians, the United States shall pay interest annually upon said principal sum at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, which interest shall be paid to the Secretary of the Interior for the use and benefit of such Indian tribes, and shall be used for the purpose of educating and preparing them for self-support and applied to their support and maintenance as may be necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment as modified.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, the proposed amendment is to take the place of the following language in the bill as reported:

> And the moneys agreed to be paid shall be appropriated and paid to said tribe or invested for its benefit, as the case may be.

I prefer the language of the bill. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon will tie up the fund so that it can not be reached by Congress. The bill as reported leaves the fund to be dealt with absolutely in the discretion of Congress after the lapse of twenty-five years, to be either paid to the Indians or to be invested for their benefit.

The simple question is whether it is better to have the law about to be passed in a flexible shape so that the discretion of Congress can at any time give direction to the fund, or to have it in the shape proposed by the Senator from Oregon, which places it beyond the power of Congress to deal with it except in a particular mode.

I prefer the language of the bill, although the amendment of the Senator from Oregon makes no very great change in it.

Mr. DAWES. The amendment involves considerable change in the present practical operation of the bill, and I wish that the Senate would direct its attention to the precise difference between it and the bill. I agree with the Senator from Texas that the language of the bill is preferable.

The purpose for which the Senator from Oregon is striving is one which I would put everything in the bill practicable to reach, just as he would; but as I stated yesterday, the bill in its present phraseology is more flexible, can adapt itself under a wise administration of the Interior Department to the real exigencies of the Indians better than the amendment. Therefore, if I can have it my own way, having the confidence I have in the Interior Department in this regard, I would prefer the language of the bill.

I hope the Senate understands the importance of this bill. It is, as was said very properly by a distinguished Senator on the other side to me last night, the beginning of the end of the Indian as an Indian. From this time forth under this bill he is to be treated as an individual; each individual Indian is to stand upon his own feet. As he steps down from his tribe under this bill he becomes amenable to the laws of the United States, and can, like every other citizen of the United States, appeal to them for protection. He will largely have to hew his own way; but it is the purpose of the bill to make available his assets for the purpose of strengthening him in this effort. As an Indian tribe set apart upon a reservation solitary and separated from the rest of the people of the United States, a quasi-independent people in the midst of the United States, if the bill becomes a law he passes out of sight. During his passage through this pupilage into the position of a full citizen of the United States I can see occasions where a wise administration of the Indian Department and of his funds and assets may require a reasonable appropriation of some of them to his support in this effort.

I know what the Senator from Oregon looks to—the danger of the Indians frittering away their assets upon unnecessary expenditures and the availing themselves of the fund for present support, when they should rely upon personal effort for it; and all that I would protest against in legislation so far as it can be done consistent with carrying on the main object of the bill. But it will be true that unless the Secretary of the Interior finds the bill flexible in that particular, and can bend it to exigencies which arise, the Indian will be appealing to Congress for appropriations to supply him with agricultural implements, with agricultural training, with farmers as teachers and as curators, and with a variety of necessities, for which this large family of 200,000 children, led out into the world by the hand as children, will and must appeal to the Treasury of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will remind the Senator that his time is up.

Mr. DAWES. If I may be indulged to finish the sentence this is the difference between the Senator's amendment and the text of the bill. It will not disturb the committee very much whether the Senate takes the one or the other, but it should take it understanding the full question.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask permission to occupy a few moments, as this is an important measure. I desire only that it may be fully understood by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is entitled to five minutes under the rule.

Mr. DOLPH. The policy of the Government for a long time past has been to put the Indians upon reservations and to purchase the title to the lands formerly held by them; until now they are confined to reservations mainly in the Western States and the Territories. The bill proposes a radical change in the Indian policy. It proposes to authorize the President in his discretion at any time to allot the lands in these reservations in severalty to the Indians located thereon in certain quantities, and authorizes the purchase of the balance of the reservations by the General Government through the Secretary of the Interior.

At the present time, or at least in 1880, which is the date of the last statistics I happen to have, the total number of Indian reservations in the United States was 147. Those reservations contained 154,436,362 acres. The estimated Indian population at that date was 255,998, which gave about 603.40 acres of land to each Indian. After purchase of the right of occupancy from the Indians and setting aside portions of the reservations to be held by them in severalty under the operation of this bill, I suppose that something over two-thirds of the area of the present Indian reservations will be restored to the public domain, amounting to over 100,000,000 acres. This amount of land, if purchased of the Indians at a reasonable price, at the present value of the land to the Indians, say 10 cents an acre, will furnish a fund which, properly husbanded, will be sufficient to provide for their support and education so long as they will require assistance from the Government.

The difference between my amendment and the present bill is this: The bill provides substantially that the purchase price may be paid over in money or invested by the Secretary of the Interior for the benefit of the Indians, as may be agreed upon. I am not in favor of giving any Department of this Government the right to make investments of that kind of funds. I am not in favor of permitting the Government to approach the Indians for the purchase of these lands with the idea that it will pay cash for them. I want to preserve that fund by providing now that we will defer the payments, that we will give the Indians upon such a purchase the promise of the Government to pay the principal sums at the option of the Government after twenty-five years, and in the mean time will pay interest upon the purchase price.

By the amendment proposed by me yesterday I suggested that such purchase price should be paid in bonds. I do not care how the money shall be invested, but I want the interest only to go to the Indian tribes for the present, and the principal of the fund to be paid whenever Congress in its wisdom may direct, twenty-five years from this time, or before, for I do not suppose that we can impose any limit upon the power of Congress to pay over the fund at any time. I do not want the Secretary of the Interior to have the power to pay or to propose to pay the Indians for their lands in cash. I want it understood that the payment shall be deferred. Why? Because we propose to adopt this bill as the last measure for acquiring the lands of the Indians or the lands to which they have the right of occupancy. We have paid from time to time large sums to extinguish the Indian title and the money has been expended with little benefit to the Indians. We propose now to allot lands to them in severalty, and to make such lands inalienable for twenty-five years, and it is supposed that at the end of twenty-five years they will become capable of taking care of themselves.

With our experience with the colored race in the South before me I fear that when the lands allotted under this bill become alienable and the Indians sell them, as they undoubtedly will, we will find them upon our hands without land and without anything out of which they can be supported, and will be compelled to support them out of the Treasury of the General Government. While we have this ample fund let us provide that it shall be an irreducible fund so long as in the judgment of Congress it is necessary, and when we find that the Indians are capable of self-support we will pay the principal, and in the mean time if it shall be necessary to supplement the interest derived from the fund with additional appropriations, let us do it.

This is an important amendment. It is an amendment that ought to be thoroughly considered. It is the last provision which we can make out of the public lands to which the Indian title has not been extinguished to prevent those people from becoming paupers on our hands twenty-five years hence, without any lands or other means of support except appropriations from the Treasury of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I think it probable that the committee have overlooked one feature of this case, which can be very easily remedied, and I wish to offer an amendment that I think will have the proper effect.

The first section of the bill as reported by the committee provides that lands may be set apart to tribes or portions of tribes and held by the United States Government in trust for the sole use and benefit of those persons who are the patentees for a certain length of time. There is no reservation made in the bill of the right of Congress to grant rights of way to railroad companies, telegraph companies, &c.; and remembering the difficulty we have had in regard to the territory of the five civilized tribes who hold their lands under patents, I propose to add the following section to the bill to remove that difficulty:

SEC. 12. Nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to affect the right and power of Congress to grant the right of way through any lands granted to an Indian or a tribe of Indians for railroad or other highway or telegraph lines for the public use or to condemn such lands to public uses.

Mr. COKE. I do not believe that amendment a necessary one, for the simple reason that I do not believe the Government can divest itself of the right of eminent domain, the power to grant the right of way through any lands under the jurisdiction of the Government; but as the Senator from Alabama says we have had some trouble in getting the right of way through the Indian Territory because no reservation was made, I see no objection to the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to hear the amendment read again.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator from Alabama who proposes this amendment whether he intends that there shall be reserved to Congress the right to grant these rights of way to these quasi-public corporations without any compensation to the holders of the lands?

Mr. MORGAN. By no means.

Mr. HARRISON. Then I suggest that should be guarded in the amendment, because I have heard it argued here that the reservation in the treaty of 1866 with the civilized tribes of the Indian Territory of the right to pass one railroad east and west and one north and south through that Territory meant that it might be done without any compensation.

Mr. COKE. I understand this amendment to use the word "condemnation," which implies ascertaining the value and granting compensation.

Mr. HARRISON. I have no objection to the amendment if the point I have suggested be guarded against, but we have had just the argument I suggested, that this reservation gave to the Government a right to grant the right of way without compensation. I think that is inconsistent with the title we propose to give to these Indians.

Mr. MORGAN. My purpose, whether I expressed it clearly enough or not, is simply to assert the right of eminent domain in this land in the Government of the United States if we grant patents, and then in the practical application of the right of eminent domain under the restrictions of the Constitution to provide compensation to the Indian I think we may take the lands. That is my purpose, and I think I have expressed it.

Mr. HARRISON. It is difficult for one to judge of the effect of language simply by the hearing of the ear, but it did not seem to me that it was expressed so as to avoid the very argument to which I have referred and which was made under a similar reservation in the treaty of 1866.

Mr. MAXEY. I think if the Senator from Alabama will add the words "upon just compensation" at the close of his amendment he will cover the entire ground.

Mr. MORGAN. I think adding the words "upon making just compensation" will cover the whole subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Let the amendment be read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment as modified will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 12. Nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to affect the right and power of Congress to grant the right of way through any lands granted to an Indian or a tribe of Indians for railroad or other highway or telegraph lines for the public use, or to condemn such lands to public use, upon making just compensation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I offer again the amendment I offered yesterday somewhat modified, so as to meet the objection which was made to it yesterday. After the forty-fourth line of section 6 I move to insert:

And if any religious society or other organization is now occupying any of the public lands to which this act is applicable for religious and educational work among the Indians, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to confirm such occupation to said society or organization in quantity not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres in any one tract, so long as the same shall be so occupied, on such terms as he shall deem just.

Mr. CONGER. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts whether there is not a provision of law now granting a section of land or some particular quantity of land to missionary establishments and school establishments.

Mr. DAWES. I believe there is, but a subsequent act like this disposing of the land would supersede any such provision as that, and this is offered in order to save the right of occupation, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CONGER. There are several of those cases that I have had my attention called to. I should like the Senator to put a clause in his amendment that nothing in this amendment shall affect any right which has heretofore accrued to any society under any other law.

Mr. DAWES. I have no objection to that if the Senator thinks it necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will please furnish the Secretary the modification he proposes.

Mr. DAWES. I do not see how it can be necessary; but if it is deemed necessary I will accept any words the Senator may suggest.

Mr. CONGER. This might be construed as cutting down privileges heretofore granted, and there should be an amendment providing that nothing herein contained shall restrict or limit any grant heretofore given.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest these words:

But this authority shall in no way impair any vested right or any right of occupancy for such purposes now existing.

Mr. CONGER. I do not exactly see how that will do, because these rights are not vested exactly. They are held in trust. Say "right conferred by existing laws."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will give the precise words to the Secretary, so that he may write them down and have the amendment understood.

Mr. CONGER reduced his amendment to writing; and it was read, as follows:

Add to the amendment of Mr. DAWES:

"But nothing herein contained shall change or alter any claim of such society for religious or educational purposes heretofore granted by law."

Mr. DAWES. I modify my amendment to that effect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment is accepted. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER, of California. There is one matter to which I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts. In the sixth section the term of the trust is fixed at twenty-five years, the time during which the United States shall hold these lands in trust for the Indians to whom they are to be allotted in severalty. At the expiration of twenty-five years each Indian or family to whom the allotment has been made will receive a title in fee-simple to the lands, with power of disposition and alienation unrestricted. It seems to me that this term is entirely too short. It is not the life of one generation in which there is an impediment placed upon the disposal of these lands. At the end of this generation these Indians will be supposed to be, according to the scheme of this bill, perfectly competent to take care of themselves, to dispose of their property by sale or otherwise, the same as white people. I hardly think that Indians will have arrived at that stage of intelligence and knowledge of the management of their affairs which will render them able to dispose of their property accordiag to their interest.

I believe that the term of this trust should be at least two generations, not less than forty-five or fifty years, because when they come into possession of this property in fee-simple speculators and all sorts of sharpers will attempt to get their lands away from them. They are an improvident people, not knowing the value of money. They will use up and spend the money they get, and soon be left without homes and without anything.

I believe the Government of the United States ought to keep the title to this property in itself for at least two generations, and I doubt even then whether the Indians will have arrived at that state of civilization which will enable them to take care of themselves. They will need then the fostering care of the Government of the United States.

That is the objection which I have to this bill, and I should like to hear from the chairman of the committee on the subject.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, in reply to the objection of the Senator from California, I refer him to the proviso on page 2, section 1, of this bill. After providing that the patent shall be issued and shall convey the land in fee discharged of trusts at the end of twenty-five years, it reads:

Provided, That the President may withhold the issuance of the patent in fee in any case for such further time as he may deem to be for the interests of the Indians. And the trust created in the original patent shall be and remain in full force until the patent in fee be issued.

If the condition of affairs exists at the expiration of twenty-five years feared by the Senator from California, here is ample discretion reserved to the President of the United States to apply the proper remedy, and that is to withhold the patents. I think that is an abundant answer to the objection the Senator has made.

Mr. MILLER, of California. That reservation had not escaped me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California is not strictly entitled to the floor under the rules, having spoken once, but the Chair will recognize him until five minutes expire since he first rose.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I only wish to say a word. I should prefer to leave it within the power of Congress rather than to leave it with the President of the United States, because influences may be brought to bear, as they often are in such cases through the Interior Department and the Indian Bureau, to bring about the very state of affairs which those people who want the possession of the lands and to acquire them desire to have brought about. I would rather keep it in the power of Congress. Congress can at any time act upon the question and release the tract in such instances as may be deemed expedient. Sometimes it might be proper to exercise control over their property and at other times it might not. Congress could act in each case according as might be best for the Government.

Mr. DAWES. The proviso to which the Senator from Texas calls attention, the Senate will observe, applies only to the tribal patent, and it is after twenty-five years discretionary with the President whether to terminate the trust or not. But as to the individual allotments the term is fixed at twenty-five years. It is fixed for several reasons. One is that the holding of land by the United States so that it can not be taxed in any community, for any unnecessary period of time, is irksome and unwise, unless there be some good reason for it. The allotment patent which is to issue after twenty-five years is only to issue to such Indians as in the opinion of the Interior Department are so far advanced in the outset as to give hope and encouragement that by this process they will be self-supporting at the end of twenty-five years from that time and be able to stand upon their own feet. I know the Senator would desire that the moment an Indian, like any white man, is able to take care of himself he should be free to dispose of his property like any white man.

While it may be true that there will be Indians who would not under such a pupilage at the end of twenty-five years or fifty years be capable of taking care of themselves and protecting themselves against the whites, there are other Indians and a large body of Indians of whom there is good ground to believe there is more hope, much more. Such Indians as the Senator alludes to would not under this bill get patents at all under any wise and proper administration of the Indian Department, because they would not, in the language of this bill, be so far advanced as to give encouragement for any such trial. There are Indians of the five civilized tribes who have not been under this pupilage for fifty years that have become wealthy—not only self-supporting but wealthy. Take the Santee Indians, who were engaged in that cruel war in Minnesota twenty years ago, and were taken and gathered into the Sioux tribe and could not be kept there and went away down into Nebraska and have had a reservation down there set apart for them, the wildest of all those Sioux Indians are now so far advanced that they are farmers capable to-day of taking care of themselves. There are Indians of whom what the Senator from California says is true, but this bill provides for such under proper administration. As to this body of the Indians, it seems to the committee and to those who have taken large interest in this matter that either thirty or twenty-five years would be a proper limit. There are many treaties with Indians in which it is stipulated that the lands shall be inalienable for twenty years. Those treaties we are bound by; but where we are not so bound it was thought on the whole that twenty-five years would be a proper limit. The Senator will observe that speculators will be embarrassed by the fact that the term of twenty-five years does not expire all at once to all the Indian tribes, but only from time to time as the patents issue. So I think if you are ever to expect that the Indian will take his place as a self-supporting man, we must presume that will be done in twenty-five years.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I suppose this bill will pass the Senate at this session, as it has heretofore; but I wish to place upon record before it passes my own objection to the action of the Senate at this time in this way. The bill proposes to establish the status of a large number of Indians to whom the faith of this Government is pledged for proper legislation in the protection of whatever rights they may have or may be capable of having. If it were not so in the treaties that have been made with these Indian tribes, the proper sentiments of philanthropy and the exercise of power beneficially in the interest and for the benefit of those who are to be affected by it would demand of us great care and consideration in the passage of a law which is to deprive them of a status heretofore had by them and of a character of government to which they have been subjected in all past time. I find in this bill the following provision:

SEC. 7. That upon the completion of said allotments and the patenting of the lands to said allottees, each and every member of the respective bands or tribes of Indians to whom allotments have been made shall have the benefit of and be subject to the laws, both civil and criminal, of the State or Territory in which they may reside.

We are proposing, then, to subject these people to a character of legislation which has not been made for them nor with reference to their unfitness to assume the responsibilities of citizens. They have heretofore been subject to a tribal relation and to a tribal government. We have placed them upon a reservation and have pledged the faith of the Government to them that they shall be governed upon that reservation, not by the laws of the State or Territory in which they live, but by laws of their own making; but that if they go beyond the limits of that jurisdiction they are subject to the full power and jurisdiction of whatever State or Territory they may be in for criminal offenses committed. We now propose to invade the reservation and to establish over them a civil and a criminal responsibility for which they are entirely unfit and of which they are entirely ignorant.

Mr. President, it strikes me that with the great care which this committee have for the Indians and for their interests, with the tenderness which the chairman of the committee is well known to possess for them and their rights and their future, it would have been possible to have provided some tangible provision as the law of the reservation to which the Indian might have been held responsible, and adapted to his peculiar condition. We who have lived in frontier States where the Indians are know that there does grow up a sentiment of extreme hostility, justified often by the barbarous acts of the Indians, on the part of the resident population, and that the character of the legislation in the States or Territories is not impregnated with any tenderness for the Indians' rights. While the people are as considerate in such States and Territories as elsewhere of rights and general benevolence, there are peculiar reasons why the laws of the State or Territory may bear with great hardship on the Indian.

Mr. President, I object to the hasty and inconsiderate passage of this bill on so important a subject. It may be that the provisions of this bill, unguarded as they are, may serve to deprive these Indians both of property and rights. Imagine the trial of an ignorant Indian, who can not speak the language, for violation of a law of which he has never heard, and before a jury of necessity hostile to him from perhaps just prejudice and a not unreasonable animosity.

Without intending to more than express my own dissent from this legislation, I find that this act provides that upon the "consent of two-thirds of the male members twenty-one years of age" the provisions in regard to the allotment in severalty of the land shall take effect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the duty of the Chair to inform the Senator that his five minutes are up.

Mr. COKE. Section 2 of this bill lays the basis for any action to be taken under the bill in this way: That—

The President be, and he hereby is, authorized, whenever in his opinion any reservation of such Indians is advantageous for agricultural or grazing purposes, and the progress in civilization of the tribe located thereon, or any of the members thereof, shall be such as to encourage the belief that an allotment of lands in severalty to the members of said tribe, or any of them, would be for the best interests of said Indians, to cause said reservation to be surveyed, or resurveyed if necessary.

The President must find these facts recited in this section of the bill to be true before he can put the machinery of this bill in motion. Then he must get the consent of two-thirds of each tribe before it operates upon that tribe. Then when the lands are surveyed patents are issued promising a fee-simple title to the Indians at the end of twenty-five years. At the expiration of that time, if there are any conditions surrounding the Indians which make it in the judgment of the President improper that they should have the fee-simple title to the land, the President is authorized to withhold patents for an indefinite time.

The bill has been guarded in every possible way. The time has arrived, Mr. President, when something must be done with the Indians. The wild game of the plains has disappeared; the settlements of the whites are pressing upon the Indian reservations on all sides. The time has come when the Government must either make the Indian a self-supporting individual or must make appropriations every year to support him, to feed him, to clothe him, to maintain him in idleness.

The object of this bill is in a slow and gradual way to bring the Indian out from the tribal condition and relation which surrounds him and individualize him, make him a member of society, and throw him upon himself for his support, instead of allowing him to rely as he does now upon the Government to feed and clothe him.

The bill is necessarily sui generis. There is a great deal of discretion reposed in the Interior Department and in the President. No man who has not grappled with this Indian question can tell how much trouble there is in framing any sort of general bill to meet the emergencies which are upon us touching the Indian tribes of this country.

This bill has been for five years before the Senate, and a large part of that time before the House. It has been brought to its present condition of perfection or imperfection, as the case may be, after the very best labors of the Commitete on Indian Affairs of the Senate for five years. It embodies the very best thought that we have been able to give it. It surmounts a great many of the difficulties that have surrounded the question, and is what has seemed to the committee to be the only practical, feasible, and possible way of dealing with the question how to emancipate the Indian from his present bondage to pauperism and tribal relationship, and make a self-supporting citizen of him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has spoken five minutes.

Mr. CALL. I move to strike out the seventh section of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida moves to amend by striking out the seventh section.

Mr. CALL. I desire to say, sir, that in the eleventh section of the bill it is provided that the consent of two-thirds of the male members of 21 years of age shall be first had and obtained before the provisions of the bill take effect alloting the land in severalty. It seems to me that there ought to be some greater precaution taken and some special mode defined as to the manner in which that consent of two-thirds of the male members shall be obtained. It ought to be guarded with very great care. All persons who have any acquiantance with the Indians know how easy it is to impose upon them when you get their confidence and employ the proper agencies for it, and how that consent may be unduly obtained, obtained before it is advisable that it should be given, obtained by unfair and improper means. This consent, however obtained, is the sole condition of this radical change of condition. We know that these Indians are ignorant and governed by their chiefs, and it is mere mockery to make this change of condition and government depend on a consent thus obtained and influenced.

Now, sir, I think this suggestion that I have made deserves consideration. I have no doubt of the ability of the committee. I have no doubt they have given to it the care and attention that it deserves. The purpose they have in view, the policy they propose to establish, meets with general commendation; but I think that the Senate ought to give longer time and more serious consideration in open Senate to perfecting the provisions of the bill, and to making the policy which they seek to establish one worthy of the country and adequate to accomplish its purposes. I shall therefore object to the consideration of this measure until we can have it considered, and I hope it will be allowed to come under Rule IX on the Calendar.

Mr. COKE. I move to proceed to the consideration of the bill notwithstanding the objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida objects to the consideration of the bill under Rule VIII. The Senator from Texas moves that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the bill notwithstanding the objection. The question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. One single word in reply to the Senator from Florida. There are two processes of allotment provided in this bill. One is applicable to the entire tribe. When in the opinion of the President of the United States the land of an Indian tribe is of such a quality as would make it wise and the Indians are in such a condition as to break up the entire tribe, to make an entire allotment, then it is supposed that if two-thirds of that tribe consent to it it will be wise to go through with it. The other process is to take every individual Indian who shall appear to be in that condition and put him upon land. It does not seem very unwise when you break up an entire tribe to take the consent of two-thirds of the Indians. That is all there is to that.

Mr. CALL. I think the bill is now open to discussion without reference to the five-minute rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is under consideration without regard to that rule, having been proceeded with on motion.

Mr. CALL. The Senator from Massachusetts does not meet the objection which is made. The allotment to individuals when they apply for land is, of course, one thing and it is very proper, and no one would object when an Indian applies for a separate allotment that he should have it. It will be, perhaps, somewhat singular that he alone of all his tribe should be made subject to the jurisdiction of the civil and penal laws of the State and Territory and the others remain exempt.

But pass that by. The great question which has been suggested is as to the manner in which that consent shall be obtained, whether it shall be obtained by getting the Indians drunk, by obtaining from them undue advantages, or whether it shall be done under the careful inspection of some designated person; whether in open council, whether by individual signature; how shall that consent of two-thirds be obtained, and is not the Government under some obligation so to legislate that it shall be fairly done and to guard the provisions of this bill which is going to make an entire change in the status of these people so that there may be no imposition practiced upon them. We know too much of the history of this Government——

Mr. COKE. Allow me to suggest to the Senator that the bill provides:

> That the provisions of this act, except those relating to the issue of tribal patents, shall not extend to any tribe of Indians as such until the consent of two-thirds of the male members 21 years of age shall be first had and obtained.

I suggest to the Senator from Florida when he goes outside of the language of the bill and presumes that their consent will not be had when the bill provides that it shall be had, it is not arguing the question legitimately. If he presumes that the Indians are to be gotten drunk or otherwise defrauded, he means in effect that they do not consent when the bill requires that they shall consent before the bill shall go into effect upon them. Does the honorable Senator presume that the Secretary of the Interior or the President or any other official required to procure this consent will wink at any proceeding which will defraud the Indians of the very thing that the bill requires they shall have, to wit, the right to object freely or to consent freely? Does he presume that this will be done? How can we make a bill plainer than that, requiring, as this bill does, the consent of two-thirds? What does consent mean? It means an honest, frank, intelligent expression of assent. Now, the honorable Senator chooses to make it mean that it shall be the consent of drunken and irresponsible Indians or that it shall mean that they are to be defrauded. The Senator is simply placing a meaning upon the language of the bill that it is not susceptible of. He should give the language of the bill its legitimate scope and meaning when criticising it.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the Senator from Florida does not presume anything. He does suppose, however, so far as the suggestion of the Senator from Texas has been made, that neither the President nor the Secretary of the Interior will personally supervise this consent, that they will have their agencies, and his objection assumes that the law may not be adequate to carry out the object and protect the Indians against imposition, that it may be improved, that there may be greater particularity in that respect, and the proposition does not assert nor presume that the Indians will be made drunk, but it assumes the possibility that some influence may be used to obtain unfairly their consent, and that in making a law for a character of people who are dependent and not able to take care of themselves, it is but prudence that that provision by which their consent is to be obtained shall be carefully guarded. When the result is dependent upon their consent, we should provide the manner in which that consent is to be obtained, so as to give some guarantee other than the fidelity of the agent that may be selected that it shall be fairly done.

That is all, sir. I have some little knowledge of the Indians myself. I know that the legislation of the country has in many respects been an act of bad faith toward them. I know that the Indians in my own country have been deprived of their entire possessions and left wanderers upon the face of the earth by imperfect legislation, when the purposes of the people and of the Government were correct toward them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida moves to strike out the seventh section of the bill. The question is on that amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HARRY I. TODD.

The bill (S. 10) for the relief of Harry I. Todd, late keeper of the Kentucky penitentiary, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to empower Harry I. Todd, late keeper of the Kentucky penitentiary, to institute and prosecute an action, within six months, in the Court of Claims, against the United States, for the recovery of the amount of internal-revenue taxes alleged to have been improperly collected from him between the years 1863 and 1868, as the duly elected and qualified keeper of the penitentiary, on manufactured articles produced at the institution by convict labor alone, and on account of other operations of that institution by him under the laws of the State of Kentucky. The Court of Claims is authorized to hear and determine the cause and render judgment therein according to the legal rights of the parties. Either party is to have the right to prosecute an appeal or writ of error, according to the nature of the cause, from the judgment of the court to the Supreme Court of the United States, at any time within sixty days after the rendition thereof; and in case the judgment shall be in favor of Todd and no appeal or writ of error shall be prosecuted therefrom by the United States, or in case there shall be such appeal or writ of error and the judgment of the Court of Claims in favor of Todd shall be affirmed, the Secretary of the Treasury is to pay to Todd the full amount of such judgment.

Mr. BECK. There is a short printed report. The bill passed the Senate before without a dissenting voice, and it has been twice reported with the same report. The report can be read, but I suppose there will be no objection to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator ask for the reading of the report?

Mr. BECK. No, sir, I do not care for it; but it can be read if any one desires it. It states the facts.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. CONGER. I read this report. I should like the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] to make some statement that is within his knowledge in regard to the persons who received the manufactures that were made. I understand this is to relieve from tax the goods manufactured at this penitentiary because it was a State institution. The report is not entirely clear as to whether the keeper of this penitentiary, being required to have certain labor done by convicts, performed that himself or contracted it to other contractors.

Mr. BECK. It was all done in the penitentiary, and the papers show that he was obliged to buy materials to manufacture on one occasion when he lost $50,000, because the law required him to do it whether it was at a loss or a profit.

Mr. CONGER. Was he under the law the agent of the State not only to employ the convicts but to purchase materials and to sell the products of their labor?

Mr. BECK. He was compelled to work them, and compelled to work them at certain classes of work, whether it paid or not. He had no right to change the work, and he had no right to do anything but work them as required by law. I think the Senator will find if he will look at the papers that the keeper was a State officer beyond all doubt.

Mr. CONGER. One other question. Why does this bill provide that the money which was paid apparently by the State on its manufactures as a tax should go to this person by name and designation? Does it not belong to the State authorities?

Mr. BECK. No. The State had had great trouble with the keepers of its penitentiary in settling accounts before and many suits involving great trouble had been had, and it adopted this means of paying its penitentiary keeper. He was an officer of the State, responsible to the State, bonded by the State, and had to do that work in that way. Now we leave it to the court to decide the question; that is all. If the court does not think he was an officer of the State and that this was a mere form of paying him his salary, he can get nothing.

Mr. CONGER. That was a point I could not quite understand from the report. If he paid over as taxes the money of the State as their agent, the indebtedness would be due to the State and not to him as an individual; but the bill makes the payment to him as an individual.

Mr. BECK. The bill leaves it to the court to settle whether he as an officer of the State received that labor as a means of paying his salary.

Mr. CONGER. I have no objection to the bill if this was such a State institution that the work was done by and for the State. Then of course under the revenue laws the tax on manufactures by the State should be refunded.

Mr. BECK. That is all.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BECK. I ask that the short report in this case be printed in the RECORD. It is a copy of one originally made by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD], then chairman of the committee, and again by Mr. Kernan, of New York. If there is no objection I should like to have it inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky asks that the report be printed in the RECORD. If there is no objection it will be done.

The report was submitted by Mr. BECK February 5, 1884, and is as follows:

The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 10) for the relief of Harry I. Todd, late keeper of the Kentucky penitentiary, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

This case was reported favorably from the Finance Committee June 1, 1880; and as embodying the present views of the committee, we beg leave to refer to and make part of this report Senate Report No. 683, Forty-sixth Congress, second session, and recommend the passage of the bill:

The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1628) for the relief of Harry I. Todd, late keeper of the Kentucky penitentiary, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

Harry I. Todd was duly elected by the General Assembly of Kentucky keeper of the State penitentiary, and held that position from March 9, 1863, until March 1, 1871.

He was elected under, and his duties, liabilities, and rights were prescribed by, chapter 922, enacted in 1862, and chapter 2045, enacted in 1867, of the laws of that State.

He received no compensation except such profits as he might make in selling the articles manufactured by the labor of the convicts, over and above their support, the cost of materials, &c., and certain sums which he was required to pay into the treasury of the State by the laws under which he was elected.

Chapter 922 of the laws of Kentucky declares:

"The keeper of the penitentiary shall hold his office for four years.

* * * * * * *

"If the keeper of the penitentiary fail or refuse to comply with the obligations imposed on him by this act, or shall be guilty of any malfeasance in office, the governor shall have full power, and it shall be his duty, to remove him forthwith.

* * * * * * *

"In the event of the death or removal from office of the keeper of the penitentiary, the governor, secretary of state, and auditor shall make a contract with a suitable person to take charge of the penitentiary according to the provisions of this act until the next ensuing meeting of the General Assembly and until a new keeper be elected and qualified."

These sections and various sections of chapter 2045, Laws of Kentucky, 1867, described the keeper as an officer subject to the control of the State. He was required to and gave a bond as an officer to perform the duties of his office as required by law.

As keeper of the penitentiary he was required by the statute to keep the convicts at labor, and for this purpose the State furnished buildings, machinery, &c., for the manufacture of certain articles, among them bagging, wagons, chairs, &c.

While in the performance of his duties as keeper from 1863 to 1869 he was called upon by the United States internal-revenue officials to pay taxes on articles manufactured by the convicts and sold by him. The taxes were paid under protest, and a claim for refunding the amount paid was duly made to the Internal Revenue Bureau. The papers submitted showed beyond a doubt that the articles were made exclusively by convict labor, and on being presented to the law officer of the Treasury, Hon. W. H. Smith, Solicitor, the claim was allowed, July 27, 1879; but the Commissioner thereupon submitted the case to C. P. James, and on his opinion the claim was rejected.

The present Commissioner of Internal Revenue declines to reopen the case, under the rules of the department that a case once decided by a former Commissioner can not be reopened by a succeeding Commissioner unless in certain contingencies, which the Commissioner thinks does not exist in the present case.

The amount of the taxes exacted by the United States officials and paid into the United States Treasury are as follows:

Statement of taxes assessed and paid.

|---|---|
| For 1863-'64. For manufacturing and sales of bagging and chairs and tax for slaughtering animals to feed convicts | $2,320 25 |
| 1865. Same and manufacturer's license for each employment | 6,691 64 |
| 1866. Same | 17,751 99 |
| 1867. Same | 4,481 00 |
| | 35,006 57 |

Your committee are of the opinion that whether Mr. Todd was liable to pay any part or all of the sums exacted is a question which should be decided by the courts. The committee therefore report back the accompanying bill with an amendment authorizing Mr. Todd to institute an action against the United States in the Court of Claims to recover the amount of said internal-revenue taxes alleged to have been improperly collected from him, and recommend its passage.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 215) reappropriating the sum of $125,000, not expended, for the relief of sufferers by the floods of the Mississippi River; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 74) to enable the State of Colorado to take lands in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections found to be mineral lands, and to secure to the State of Colorado the benefit of the act of July 2, 1862, entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts."

SUFFERERS BY MISSISSIPPI FLOODS.

Mr. GIBSON. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to take up the joint resolution just received from the House of Representatives appropriating $125,000 for the relief of the sufferers in the lower valley of the Mississippi River.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution just received from the House of Representatives. It will be read by title.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask that it be read in full for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read in full for information.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

A joint resolution (H. Res. 215) reappropriating the sum of $125,000, not expended, for the relief of sufferers by the floods of the Mississippi River.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That so much of the appropriation for the relief of sufferers by the overflow of the Ohio River and its tributaries as remains unexpended, not exceeding the sum of $125,000, may be used by the Secretary of War in the purchase and distribution of subsistence stores and payment for necessary transportation to aid in the relief of destitute persons in the district overflowed by the Mississippi River and its tributaries; and he is authorized to co-operate with the authorities of the several States of which such district is a part in making distribution of supplies.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution? The Chair hears none.

The joint resolution was read the second time by its title.

Mr. INGALLS. As the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. ALLISON] is not present, I would suggest that it might be as well for him to be sent for, or let the joint resolution lie on the table for a few moments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas objects to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. INGALLS. Just for a few moments, until the Senator from Iowa can be sent for.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana waive the motion for the present?

Mr. GIBSON. Yes, sir.

HELEN M. FIEDLER.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The consideration of the Calendar under Rule VIII will be resumed, beginning with Order of Business 160, being a resolution reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations on the 5th of February, relative to the claim of Helen M. Fiedler, widow and executrix of Ernest Fiedler, deceased. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, That the President of the United States be requested to bring to the attention of the Emperor of Brazil the claim of Helen M. Fiedler, executrix of Ernest Fiedler, deceased, against the Government of Brazil, growing out of a contract alleged by said claimant to be obligatory on that government, for the hire of the ship Circassian to transport emigrants from the United States to Brazil in the year 1867, with a view to ask said government to consider the said claim, and to provide for the allowance and payment of such sum as shall be found just to such claimant.

Mr. MORGAN. A joint resolution on the same subject passed the Senate at the last session and went to the House. This is simply a Senate resolution. The Committee on Foreign Relations have modified the proposition to a mere Senate resolution. The written report sets forth the whole merits of the claim. It is a very meritorious claim, and I trust that the assistance of the Senate will result in bringing the attention of the Government of Brazil to it in such a way that this old lady can get just compensation for about twenty or twenty-five thousand dollars' worth of property.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire under what principle of constitutional policy the legislative branch of the Government, or one part of it, undertakes to deal with questions of this character. It is the duty of the executive having charge of the foreign relations of the country to look out for the interests of American citizens abroad in proper cases. As I am aware and every Senator is aware, it is frequently done. If the State Department has refused on investigation to deal with a claim of an American citizen abroad in the mode suggested by this resolution, it has undoubtedly a good reason for that refusal. Unless there were good reasons to the contrary, it would act on the direct application of the individual concerned to the President or the Secretary of State. Now, why should the Senate, unless there is some matter which would involve the use of the public force of the country in war, undertake to consider the merits of a particular claim against Brazil and to give its advice to the executive department as to an executive act?

Mr. MORGAN. The old rules of this body provided for the appearance of the President in the midst of the body for the purpose of consulting with the Senate on any question that we saw proper to bring to his attention or that he chose to bring to our notice. There is, therefore, no constitutional or legal bar between the President of the United States and the Senate in respect of our mutual conferences with each other or the advice we may see proper to give to each other.

This case has never been presented to the State Department, so far as I know, with a view to ask the good offices of that Department with the Government of Brazil. This old lady, who has suffered a very great loss in consequence of the non-compliance of the Brazilian Government with a contract made with her husband, came here with solicitations that the Congress of the United States would intervene, I suppose in a more stringent manner than we desired to recommend, and the matter went to the Committee on Foreign Relations and was there considered. They reported back a joint resolution, as I remarked a while ago, which passed this body, asking the good offices of the President in that direction. The present committee have seen proper to modify the resolution so as to make it a Senate resolution, as it is a mere matter of request or advice to the President.

The committee thought, and I concur in that opinion, that the Government of Brazil itself, the government proper, had really not acted upon this matter so as to entirely reject the claim, but left the subject open to further consideration. We have laws which prohibit our citizens from holding anything like diplomatic relations with foreign governments, and yet we have none preventing them from making contracts with those governments; and still we hold toward our citizens a sort of representative capacity, and we are the medium through which perhaps they can properly make known their requests on foreign governments and the merits of their claims.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator say this matter has never been called to the attention of the State Department or the President?

Mr. MORGAN. I am not aware that this matter has been called to the attention of the State Department since it was acted upon by a section of the Brazilian Government.

Mr. HOAR. Is there a written report?

Mr. MORGAN. There is a written report, which goes very fully into the whole merits of the case.

Mr. HOAR. Then I will object, in order that I may examine the report. There is no time to examine it now before 2 o'clock, it wanting but five minutes of that hour. Let the resolution go over until to-morrow.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope in the mean time the Senator from Massachusetts will inform himself. It is a case of very great merit.

Mr. HOAR. It is a very extraordinary precedent.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator is mistaken about that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the objection of the Senator from Massachusetts extend to the consideration of the resolution or does he simply ask that it be passed over?

Mr. HOAR. I object to the present consideration.

Mr. MORGAN. Let it go over, to remain on the Calendar.

Mr. HOAR. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be left on the Calendar, then, without displacement.

Mr. HARRIS. To be at the head of the Calendar to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next bill will be reported.

Mr. CONGER. What was done with this resolution?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution has been objected to, and goes over to stand at the head of the Calendar of unobjected cases for to-morrow.

MISSOURI MILITIA FORCES.

The bill (S. 940) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be examined certain vouchers filed, or to be filed, by the State of Missouri, or her agent or agents, for sums claimed to be due from the Government of the United States on account of payments made by said State since April 22, 1882, to the officers and enlisted men of her militia forces for military services rendered to the United States in the suppression of the rebellion, as evidenced by the proper pay-rolls heretofore filed with, examined, and accepted by the Government of the United States, and to report to Congress, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments, which were, in line 12, before the word "names," to strike out "of," and in the same line, after the word "pay-rolls," to insert "of."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. Let me ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether it covers anything more than an examination and a report to Congress?

Mr. COCKRELL. That is all. There was one act passed reimbursing Missouri for her expenditures, and those rolls that were filed showed a certain sum to be still due from the State but not paid. The State paid that, and another bill was then passed requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to investigate and report to Congress. He reported, and two hundred and odd thousand dollars were paid, but the roll showed still sums due from the State. The State then went to work and passed a bill requiring all the claims that had not been paid to be presented, and if not presented by a certain date to be forever barred. That day was in January. Under that bill about a thousand dollars has been paid by the State. Now, this is simply to have that payment investigated and reported to Congress.

Mr. CONGER. This may possibly wind up the affair.

Mr. COCKRELL. This will wind up the affair.

Mr. CONGER. Are there additions that the State of Missouri desires to make to the roll?

Mr. COCKRELL. No. The State required all these claims to be presented, and those not presented within the specified time are barred. They are now barred. There was a test case in the Supreme Court against the adjutant-general to test the validity of the bar, and the Supreme Court held that it was a good bar.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a preamble to the bill. It will be regarded as agreed to unless there be objection after being read.

The preamble was read.

The preamble was agreed to.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. HARRISON to the amendment offered by Mr. PLUMB.

Mr. BLAIR. I know there are Senators who design to speak, but I suppose they are not at this moment in the Chamber, and I will consume two or three minutes in stating a matter that I desire to lay before the Senate at some time. That is with reference to the constitutional question that is supposed to be involved in this bill as illustrated by the previous action of the Senate in the passage of bills at former Congresses. I allude especially to the bill for the establishment of a permanent educational fund, which has been familiar to the country for many years, and in support of which the leading men of the Senate (if there are leading men in the Senate) upon both sides of the Chamber have concurred, known as the Burnside bill when last before the Senate, and which is now known as the Morrill bill, and is pending before the Senate later on the Calendar, and which was early supported, if not initiated, by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. That bill contains every principle of a constitutional character or an unconstitutional character which is offensive to those who complain of the lack of constitutionality in the bill before the Senate; and yet most of those who oppose this bill have sanctioned that by their previous action, speeches, and votes in the Senate. While containing the offensive principles, that measure contains nothing whatever of a substantial character to redeem that offensiveness and make the bill acceptable and important for the time being to the country. With reference to the future I may say that the purpose of that bill is sublime, and it meets my most hearty approbation; but its immediate effect upon the condition of the country, as its friends concede, is unimportant. It proposes to set apart as a permanent fund the avails of the public lands from year to year. But that is not all. The bill takes directly from the cash in the Treasury, from the revenues of the Government, and particular revenues derived from the Patent Office, and appropriates that actual money as well as the proceeds of land for the purpose indicated.

So the Senators who justify their course in maintaining and voting for that bill are not relieved of the indorsement of the constitutional principle involved in the measure pending before the Senate in an actual appropriation of money from the Treasury, because the former bill appropriated the money just as this does, differing only in amount. At the time that bill was last passed by the Senate, by a vote of 18 Democrats concurring with 23 Republicans, the amount of the patent fund in the Treasury, which was appropriated with the proceeds of public lands, as I remember, was over a million and a half of dollars; it was accruing at the rate of several hundred thousand dollars year after year, and the whole was set apart forever to constitute a permanent fund for the benefit of common-school education and agricultural-school education forever.

I hold in my hand Senate bill 133 of the Forty-sixth Congress, entitled "A bill to establish an educational fund, and apply a portion of the proceeds of the public lands to public education, and to provide for the more complete endowment and support of national colleges for the advancement of scientific and industrial education." I will send to the Secretary and ask him to read the first and second sections of that bill.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the net proceeds of sales of public lands and the net proceeds of patents are hereby forever consecrated and set apart for the education of the people: Provided, That this act shall not have any effect to repeal, impair, or suspend any law now authorizing the pre-emption of public lands, or the entry of public lands for homesteads, nor as limiting in any manner the power of Congress to alter or extend the right of homestead upon such lands: And provided further, That nothing contained in this section shall be held to limit or abridge the power of Congress over the public domain or interfere with granting bounty lands.

SEC. 2. At the close of each fiscal year the Secretary of the Interior shall cause an account to be taken, and shall ascertain the total receipts from the sale or other disposition of the public lands of the United States, including all fees received at the general and district land offices during said year, and the amount of expenditures occasioned by the survey, sale, or entry, or other disposition of such lands, including appropriations for the expenses of the said offices for said year. He shall also ascertain in like manner the net proceeds of all receipts for patents after deducting the expenses of the Patent Office. He shall thereupon certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the amount of said receipts for public lands and patents after deducting such expenditures.

Mr. BLAIR The bill then proceeds to make many other provisions substantially the same as are made in the bill pending before the Senate for the application of the moneys derived from the interest of the permanent fund thus constituted. By the bill the fund was to be a permanent fund. The tendency of course of the establishment of a permanent fund is to lead to the ultimate and complete dependence of the schools of the States upon funds derived from the General Government. The existing bill is not subject to that objection. It is very true that it is not probable that the amount to be derived from the interest on this permanent fund will ever be so large as to constitute a serious objection to the bill on that account; and yet in principle it is not at all more objectionable than the one now before the Senate. Yet Senators found no difficulty in indorsing that bill. Its constitutionality was defended by the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, not now a member of this body, Mr. Bailey, chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor which reported it. The propriety, completeness, efficiency, and constitutionality of its various conditions and provisions were sustained by eloquent, logical, able addresses before the Senate by many prominent Senators, Republicans and Democrats alike. I will not take this occasion, I will not embrace any occasion to read the speeches that Senators made on that bill. I have said perhaps sufficient to indicate that it was as strongly supported from the Democratic side of the Chamber as from the Republican side of the Chamber, and when the final vote was reached on the bill the yeas were 41 and the nays were but 6, and of those voting in the affirmative 18 were Democrats and 23 Republicans, if I have made my count correctly. The entire proceedings will be found in volume 11, part 1, of the RECORD, Forty-sixth Congress.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator read the negative vote?

Mr. BLAIR. I will read both the affirmative and negative:

Yeas—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bailey, Baldwin, Beck, Blaine, Blair, Brown, Bruce, Burnside, Call, Cameron of Pa., Cameron of Wis., Coke, Davis of Illinois, Davis of W. Va., Dawes, Edmunds, Ferry, Garland, Hereford, Hill of Colorado, Hill of Georgia, Hoar, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Kellogg, Logan, McMillan, McPherson, Maxey, Morgan, Morrill, Platt, Pugh, Ransom, Rollins, Teller, Vance, Walker, Windom—41.

Nays—Messrs. Jonas, McDonald, Saulsbury, Vest, Voorhees, Williams—6.

Absent—Messrs. Bayard, Booth, Butler, Carpenter, Cockrell, Conkling, Eaton, Farley, Groome, Grover, Hamlin, Hampton, Harris, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, Kernan, Kirkwood, Lamar, Paddock, Pendleton, Plumb, Randolph, Saunders, Sharon, Slater, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, Withers—29.

I do not note that any pairs were announced. At this time I designed only to make a statement of these historical facts and to refer to the RECORD so far as the previous action of the Senate was concerned touching the question of the constitutionality of this bill.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, that motion is debatable, I suppose?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PENDLETON in the chair). It is.

Mr. VANCE. I desire to remark upon the fact that the debate on this bill has resulted in an amount of vainglorious boasting on the one hand and on the other of taunting of the more unfortunate States in the matter of education that deserves to have the ground on which it is done thoroughly examined. We are constantly told in this debate of the superiority of certain States in the matter of education over all those in the South.

Now, sir, there are some things in connection with the education of the Northern States, especially those of the Northwest, that ought to be taken into consideration. In the first place they received, as has been stated here again and again, large donations of public land to aid them, while the States of the South, who are constantly twitted in the course of this debate with their illiteracy, have received none or next to none. The State of Kansas, for instance, I find, notwithstanding that one of its Senators [Mr. INGALLS] asserted the other day that it had received not an acre—Kansas has received for educational purposes 3,439,345 acres, which at the Government price were worth $4,299,178; and I find by a reference to the messages of the Governor of Kansas and the reports of the State officers that those lands given to that school-fund are now selling for something over $6 per acre. There is eighteen or twenty million dollars given for education at one swoop. Kansas is not exceptional in this respect. Other Northwestern States received donations of the same kind.

I want another fact to be taken into consideration, that in consequence of those Northwestern States having within their borders the finest lands on this American continent, there was a wondrous rush of immigration there, and nearly all the present population of those States came to them already educated. They were educated in the older States, and therefore the new States in whose borders they now reside are not entitled to the credit of their literacy.

I find that notwithstanding all that the States of the South have gone through; notwithstanding the universal destruction of their property and the overthrow of their governments and the desolation of their homes and their fields by war, and the destruction of their securities, trust funds, and what not, the State of North Corolina has more public schools than the State of Kansas. She has not more in proportion to her population, I admit, but she has more; by the census of 1880 she had 6,161 public schools, while Kansas had 6,148. North Carolina educated 256,422 pupils in 1880, while Kansas educated 246,120. I find that North Carolina had 6,226 teachers in 1880, 1,975 of whom were for the benefit of the colored people. I find that Kansas had 6,619 teachers. I find that this poor State of North Carolina educated in the year 1880, 95,160 colored children, while the State of Kansas educated 6,890—nearly 90,000 less. I find that North Carolina provides 2,146 separate schools for the negroes and that Kansas provides 45.

Mr. PLUMB. Is that because the people of North Carolina are unwilling to have the children educated together?

Mr. VANCE. Yes, sir.

Mr. PLUMB. That is to say, the people of North Carolina do not desire to have the white and black children educated in the same school?

Mr. VANCE. We do not desire any kind of social equality. Does the Senator from Kansas desire that?

Mr. PLUMB. Well, Mr. President, the people of Kansas have provided, with very minor exceptions, for the education of children, white and black, in the same school.

Mr. VANCE. That is the first step toward social equality, which I suppose the Senator approves.

Mr. PLUMB. Well, Mr. President, the old cry of being afraid that your daughter might marry a "nigger" never did obtain much west of the Mississippi River.

Mr. VANCE. Still, Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Senator does not categorically answer the question, and my opinion is that he is not likely so to do.

The necessity of keeping up separate schools, as any one may be aware, necessarily increases the cost to a very great extent. I find that the white population of North Carolina, by the census of 1880, is 867,000 in round numbers, and the black population is 531,000 in round numbers. Of that number of 531,000 blacks I believe there is an estimate that their individual property is worth $5 per capita, and for all practical purposes you may say that they are utterly without property and therefore without the means of paying taxation, and the education that is given to them is bound to come from the taxable whites. So that 867,000 whites in the State of North Carolina have to support in the matter of education 531,000 propertyless persons without the means to pay taxes. That imposes, therefore, a greater burden per capita on the citizens of North Carolina than is upon the citizens of Kansas.

Now, in the matter of the comparative wealth of the two States, it will be remembered that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] asserted on the floor the other day that North Carolina was poor because her people were ignorant. I have some statistics that go very far toward showing that North Carolina is not any poorer than Kansas, although she has these great burdens to bear. The wealth in real estate of the State of North Carolina in 1880 was $101,709,000. The personalty in that year was $54,390,000, making in round numbers $156,000,000. One hundred and fifty-six millions was the total taxable property in North Carolina in 1880. The wealth of Kansas in real estate was $108,432,000; personalty $52,459,000; total $160,891,000, only about $4,000,000 difference, and the per capita of wealth in the State of Kansas was $161, while in North Carolina, including the negroes who paid no tax and owned no property, it was $111 per head, and, exclusive of the negroes, the white population of North Carolina who owned the property was $174 per head. Now, sir, there is nearly an equality between the States in wealth, and one has to bear the burden of two-fifths of its population utterly without property. What is the cause of the poverty of Kansas?

Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] the other day read us a lecture, in which he said that the old Commonwealth of Massachusetts still led the column in the matter of education. Now let us see how she leads the column, how far she actually leads it, how far she ought to lead it. The valuation of property in Massachusetts in 1880 was $1,584,000,000, and her total taxes were $24,323,000, 20 per cent. of which is devoted to school purposes, and the rate of taxation on the $100 is $1.53. The total valuation of property in North Carolina for the same year was $156,100,000, and the total taxation very nearly $2,000,000 ($1,916,000), 18 per cent. of which is for schools, and the rate of taxation in that State is $1.22. So we see that while the wealth of Massachusetts is ten times greater than that of North Carolina, the amount of her taxation devoted to school purposes is only nine times greater than North Carolina, and the percentage of her taxation which is devoted to education is only 2 per cent. greater than North Carolina.

Sir, I think that is doing pretty well for North Carolina; and when we come to consider the way in which that old Commonwealth got her wealth, I think that her Senators are as little entitled to taunt the South on their poverty and their illiteracy as those who have received direct land grants in aid of education. For it is known to everybody acquainted with the financial history of this country that the whole continent has been taxed to support Massachusetts ever since the Government was formed. North Carolina considers her one of her chief paupers, and the appropriations annually made in the consumption of manufactured articles in North Carolina for the support of Massachusetts would render her taxation far ahead of the taxation of Massachusetts.

In the conclusion of his speech the Senator from Massachusetts used an epithet toward the State of North Carolina; he shot it back at her as he took his seat, and he rolled it under his tongue evidently as though he had been studying it up for a long while; he spoke of North Carolina as the "tail State." Now, Mr. President, I wish to say——

Mr. HOAR. The Senator misunderstood me. If he will look at the report of what I said he will see that he does not quote me correctly.

Mr. VANCE. I have it before me, and I do not think I can be mistaken in it.

I do not think—

Said the Senator from Massachusetts—

I do not think, with these statistics coming by State authority to the United States Government year by year, that there will be Senators from North Carolina making such speeches as we heard yesterday. That State will have something else to say, if she is the tail State among the thirty-eight of the American Commonwealths in the matter of her school children, than what her Senator told us on this floor yesterday.

I presume the Senator will stand by the record, will he not? I was going to say that as a matter of course it was a subject of mortification to me as well as to other Southern Senators to be constantly made aware of the fact that our States are at the tail end of literacy. But, sir, there is a deeper depth of mortification; and I am much in the condition of a young man of whom I once heard who had the misfortune of being knocked down in a fight with a circus company. Though not much injured, he took to his bed as though he would break his heart, and in reply to those who endeavored to console him by telling him that any man was liable to be knocked down, that there was nothing in that, "Oh, yes," said he, "I know that; but, Lord! Lord! they knocked me down with the same stick they stirred the monkeys with." [Laughter.]

It is a source of mortification to me for any Senator to get up and appeal to the figures and say that my State is at the bottom in regard to illiteracy, but it adds a pang to the sharpness of that mortification, it adds another understory to the depth of that humiliation, to be told so by the Senator from the Tewksbury State; a Senator from a State that has fattened on the public taxation of this country; a State that from the very beginning of the foundation of our Government, rather of our struggle for independence, has sacrificed every principle and every profession that was inconvenient for the purpose of gain, to taunt those with poverty who have been kept poor by the process of plunder! A State that is more responsible under heaven than any other community in this land for the introduction of slavery into this continent, with all the curses that have followed it; that is the nursing mother of the horrors of the middle passage, and that after slavery in Massachusetts was found not to pay sold those slaves down South for a consideration, and then thanked God, and sang the long-meter doxology through their noses, that they were not responsible any longer for the sin of human slavery, should at least be modest in applying epithets to her neighbors.

If I may be permitted to disturb the dignified solemnities of this body for one moment I will state what it reminds me of. I heard once of an old maid who got religion at a camp-meeting. Immediately after she experienced the change she commenced exhorting the younger and prettier women in regard to wearing jewelry and gew-gaws, and warned them against the pernicious consequence to piety of such vanities. "Oh! girls," she said, "I tell you, I used to wear earrings and finger-rings and laces and furbelows like you do, but I found they were dragging my immortal soul down to hell, and I stripped them every one off and sold them to my younger sister Sally." [Laughter.] That is the way Massachusetts relieved herself from slavery. That is the way she preserved her whiteness of soul.

Now, there was no necessity for the remark of the Senator from Massachusetts. I had made no assault upon him. He was supporting the bill, as I supposed I was. He was supporting it in his peculiar way and I was supporting it in mine; and the remark, as you will see, is entirely illogical, inconsequential, and disconnected. It was a pure emanation of venom toward the Southern people and toward my State. There was no necessity for it; and I have felt it my duty to allude to it as I have done.

I wish to repeat, as I close, the remarks which I made when this discussion was opened. I do not stand here to ask for this bill for the benefit of the white people of North Carolina. They do need aid of course, but they would not need it if all their ability to pay taxes and to educate their own people could be concentrated upon their own color. But the colored people in their midst are citizens of North Carolina. They are entitled to the same treatment precisely that any other citizens of North Carolina are entitled to at the hands of the lawmakers of that State. There is now, and there has been, no disposition whatever to treat them in any other way. Poor as we are, our taxes are levied indiscriminately without regard to race or color, and expended for the benefit of all the illiterate children in North Carolina. In consequence of that burden, in consequence of the condition that every man knows that the State of North Carolina and the South was placed in by the results of the war, I have felt it my duty to support this bill in order to get what relief I could against the dangers and the evils of illiteracy that the State is not competent to oppose.

I wish to say that these constant taunts and twittings of the States of the South with their poverty and their inability to give their people proper education have long ago ceased to be merely a want of magnanimity and have passed into the boundaries of positive and absolute meanness. It threatens to convert the insolent pride of Tom Bounderby of Coketown into pious humility and to elevate by contrast the character of Pecksniff into that of a most respectable Christian gentleman. Magnanimous Senators would not do it, sir.

Mr. President, this is twice that I have spoken upon this bill. I trust that there will not be any occasion for me to speak upon it any more.

Mr. DOLPH. I submitted a proposed amendment to the pending bill for the purpose of having it printed. It has been printed and laid on the desks of Senators, and as I desire at this time to make some remarks on the bill which will be applicable to the amendment, or which may be properly considered if the bill should be recommitted, I ask to have the amendment read by the Secretary of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent to offer, now out of order, the amendment heretofore proposed by him. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask that it be read in connection with my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not understand that the Senator asks to offer it, except informally, in order to make a speech at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He offers it to have it printed.

Mr. BLAIR. It is already printed, but he offers it to be read preceding his remarks.

Mr. HARRIS. He wishes to have it read for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Oregon state again what he desires?

Mr. DOLPH. The amendment was proposed for the purpose of being printed, and was printed under the order of the Senate, and has been laid on the desks of Senators. As I now desire to make some remarks in regard to the bill which may apply to that amendment, and as it may be thought proper to be considered by the committee if the bill should be recommitted, I ask that the amendment proposed by me may be read now, preceding the remarks which I propose to make.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a new section:

SEC. 16. That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a commissioner of common schools in each State and Territory, who shall be a citizen thereof, and who shall reside therein and be especially charged with all the details of the execution of this act within his jurisdiction and in co-operation with the State authorities, and who shall perform such other duties as may be assigned to him by the Secretary of the Interior. In the Territories such commissioners shall also be charged with the general supervision of public education within their respective Territories, and shall possess all the powers now vested in Territorial superintendents of public instruction, or by Territorial boards of education, or other Territorial officers performing the usual functions of such superintendents and boards. Such commissioners shall devote themselves to the promotion of the general interest of public education in the respective States and Territories for which they have been appointed. They shall annually make full reports of all matters connected with schools within their respective States and Territories, and of all details in the administration of this act, to the Secretary of the Interior, and special reports when requested by the Secretary to do so. Each commissioner shall receive a salary of $3,000 a year.

Mr. DOLPH. When on Friday last I proposed the amendment which has just been read I intended to let it be submitted to a vote of the Senate without provoking discussion by any extended explanation of its provisions. I thought the object of the amendment was sufficiently apparent, and that that object would commend itself to all Senators who thought as I did, and I was perfectly well aware that to undertake to convince any one who did not believe the amendment necessary would be to enter upon an unprofitable field of discussion.

Since then the character of the discussion upon this question has very materially changed. We have had charges and counter-charges, crimination and recrimination. Senators on this side of the Chamber who do not approve of all the provisions of the bill have been charged by our brethren upon the other side of the Chamber with insincerity in professing to desire the education of the colored people in the South. So much has been laid at the door of the General Government and of the Republican party by Senators on the other side of the Chamber by direct charge and by insinuation on account of past transactions affecting the civil and political status of the colored people in the South, and this measure is of so much importance and has excited such general interest, that I think I am justified in giving some reasons why I have offered the amendment just read and in making some general observations in regard to the bill.

I freely admit that great deference ought to be shown to the opinions and recommendations of the committee who have prepared and reported the bill. I admire the ability and research of the chairman of the committee, and commend the earnestness with which he has pressed the bill upon the attention of the Senate. But nevertheless, in my action upon the bill, I must be governed by my own judgment as to its merits, and I am not willing that my position upon the question of general education, and the power and duty of the General Government to aid in the cause of popular education in any portion of this Union, should be determined here or elsewhere by my approval or disapproval of the bill.

With all due deference to the authors and friends of the bill, it appears to me there is too much of a disposition to look upon the disapproval of any of the provisions of the bill as hostility to the measure itself. We are asked to accept the bill as an oracle or a revelation, or at least as coming from some infallible source.

I concur in the main with the Senator from New Hampshire in the proposition which he laid down in his speech in opening the debate upon this measure as to the duty of the General Government to aid in the education of the masses and in promoting the intelligence and virtue of the people. It is the duty of the nation to educate itself; and I believe that it is the duty of the Federal Government, in so far as the power to do so has been conferred upon it, to aid by appropriations out of the Federal Treasury in providing the means for the instruction of the children who are to become the voters and lawmakers of the nation, in any portion of this Union, when a necessity therefor arises by reason of the failure of the State governments to educate the children of school age within their borders. This duty of educating the rising generation exists because the perpetuity of our national existence, the preservation of our free institutions, and the prosperity and consequent happiness and general welfare of the people demand it.

Conceding, therefore, that the constitutional power exists in the General Government to aid general education when the circumstances demand it, and conceding also that illiteracy prevails in some portions of this country to such an extent as to justify the General Government in interfering and making appropriations for that purpose, nevertheless I do not entirely approve of this bill. One objection to the bill is that it is proposed by it to grant aid to all the States and Territories of the Union for educational purposes, without reference to the question as to whether a necessity for such aid exists. It is assumed that in every State and Territory of this Union illiteracy prevails to such an extent, and there exists such inability or indisposition upon the part of the State and Territorial governments to educate the masses, that there is a necessity for the General Government to interfere and make appropriations out of the Treasury for the purpose of doing that which the State governments and Territorial governments can not or will not do.

I think the assumption is not justified by the facts. We have already heard it asserted during this debate by Senators from two of the Southern States that those States have sufficient ability to educate their own children. I do not think there is a State among the New England States, the Northern States, the Middle States, the States and Territories of the great West, nor of the Pacific coast that has not sufficient ability to educate all the children of school age within its borders. I apprehend that the illiteracy which is shown to exist in those States is not the result of the want of ability and disposition on the part of the States to provide the means of education, but is caused by the failure of the parents of the children to require their attendance upon the schools provided, and probably in part by the arrival in those States of illiterate foreigners after they have passed the school age, and for whose illiteracy those communities are not responsible.

It has been admitted during the debate on this bill and it is generally understood that the aid for educational purposes to be given by the General Government under the provisions of this bill is intended for the education of the colored children of the South. If that is the case, why not go directly at the matter? Why not provide for the object intended without all this circumlocution? I can see no objection to a bill by which an appropriation shall be made to aid in providing the means for education where such aid is required without appropriating money to aid the States and Territories where such aid is not required. I can not see that any constitutional objection is avoided by making the provisions of the bill applicable to all the States and Territories of the Union. On the contrary, I think the fact that this bill undertakes to make appropriations for school purposes in States where such aid is not needed is an objection to the bill.

While I am willing in view of the illiteracy which is alleged to exist in certain portions of the Union, and in view of the fact that there is not the ability or the disposition in those portions of the Union to educate the masses, to support any practical measure by which the necessary aid shall be afforded to the States where aid is needed, I am not willing under the pressure of the plea of the great importance of immediate action to shut my eyes and swallow blindly any measure which may be offered.

Neither am I willing to admit that any measure of relief which shall be granted by the General Government with my concurrence is made as the payment of an obligation which the Government owes to any section of this country on account of any past transactions affecting the civil or political status of the colored race. I am not willing to admit as between any portion of this Union and the General Government that the latter is to blame for the ignorance of the colored people in the South or for their alleged unfitness to exercise the elective franchise. I am not willing to admit that the General Government in striking the shackles from 4,000,000 slaves in the South committed a wrong against the people of the South or against the people of any section of this Union. I am not willing to admit that the Congress of the United States in passing laws and the Federal courts and the executive officers in undertaking to enforce laws for the protection of the citizens of the United States in those rights which by the Declaration of Independence were asserted to be the inalienable rights of man have wronged the South or wronged any portion of this Union. Lastly, I am not willing to admit that the General Government in declaring that all the citizens of the United States shall be entitled to the elective franchise violated the rights of the South or did anything for which reparation must now be made.

I wish it understood, so far as I am concerned, that the duty of the Federal Government to aid in the education of citizens of any part of the Union rests, if that obligation exists at all, upon the fact that illiteracy exists there, that the presence of illiterate masses in a free government is dangerous, and that there is a want of ability or a want of disposition in the States upon whom the primary obligation of educating the citizens of the States is devolved to educate the masses, and therefore the General Government, as a matter of self-protection, undertakes to do that which the States are unable or unwilling to do.

I am not willing either to concede, at least I am not convinced, that there is a State in this Union which could not, if it was thoroughly in earnest in the matter of education, provide the means for obtaining a common-school education to every child within the State. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] yesterday referred to the condition of the school system of his State fifty years ago. I do not believe there is a State in this Union but which to-day has as much ability to educate every child of school age within its borders as the State of Massachusetts and the other New England States had fifty years ago.

I hold in my hand a copy of the report of the clerk of school district No. 1, of Multnomah County, Oregon, for the year 1883. As we have had so many statistics on this question I will ask the Secretary to read it, that it may be incorporated in my remarks.

Mr. DOLPH. To be read in connection with that report I have compiled from the tables recorded in the speech of the chairman of the committee having this bill in charge a statement showing the amount which would be available for school purposes in the Southern States during the first year under the operation of this bill, provided the rate of taxation for school purposes were the same as in the year 1880:

| Virginia | $2,198,306 77 |
| West Virginia | 919,766 89 |
| North Carolina | 1,530,351 94 |

| Kentucky | 2,034,958 56 |
| Tennessee | 1,839,305 71 |
| Total | 19,135,094 36 |

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator be kind enough to repeat his statement?

Mr. DOLPH. I refer to a table which I have compiled from one of the tables incorporated in the Senator's speech upon this bill, which shows the amount which would be available for school purposes in the several Southern States during the first year under the operation of this bill, derived from the funds proposed to be appropriated and from taxation at the same rate as in 1880. The total amount is $19,135,094.36.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not quite understand the Senator. Does he say that that would be the amount they would receive for the first year?

Mr. DOLPH. That would be the amount they would receive under this bill and the amount which would be derived from taxation at the same rate as in 1880 and upon the same valuation of property, as shown by the census returns for 1880. It is taken from the Senator's own table.

Mr. BLAIR. There is some misunderstanding, because the entire appropriation from the General Government under the bill would be but $15,000,000 the first year.

Mr. DOLPH. In the Senator's speech delivered in opening this debate he presented a table showing what would be provided for school purposes in the several States under the provisions of the bill—that is, the appropriation for the first year added to the amount which would be raised by taxation at the same rate as in 1880. I have simply compiled a table from the Senator's statistics showing what amount would be received by the Southern States.

Mr. BLAIR. Do I understand that the Senator's table shows that the Southern States, taxing themselves for school purposes at the same rate they did in 1880, would now receive $19,000,000?

Mr. DOLPH. No, sir; but it shows the amount which would be raised by taxation added to their share of the appropriation proposed by the bill.

Mr. BLAIR. Put together?

Mr. DOLPH. The amount available for school purposes in all the Southern States would be $19,000,000 and over.

Mr. BLAIR. I understand the Senator. That is not a very strange statement considering that they are now paying about $14,000,000 in those same States, and would receive under the provision of the bill $10,000,000 or $11,000,000; so that really with their present taxation largely increased over that of 1880 they would be giving $24,000,000 or $25,000,000, making a good showing.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator is certainly mistaken in regard to that. I have taken the figures from the table he presented in his speech, and I undertake to say that it is a correct statement, and they could not in 1880, the year to which the table refers, have expended the amount now stated by him.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not wish to be understood as saying that they spent that in 1880. They have spent by the latest returns that I have seen $13,303,000, and it has been thought that the present year the aggregate of expenditure will be about $14,000,000 in the Southern States.

Mr. DOLPH. So much the better for my purpose in the illustration which I desire to make. Not having the figures at hand showing the amount which was expended during the last year, I took the figures presented by the Senator from New Hampshire, showing the amount which was expended in 1880 as the basis of the statement which I proposed to make. According to the table presented by the Senator from New Hampshire the total assessed value of the taxable property of the Southern States for the year 1880, according to the census returns shown by the table presented by him on page 2203 of the RECORD, was $2,370,923,269.

The several county courts of Oregon are required by law to levy an annual tax for school purposes of 3 mills on the dollar, and for the year 1883, the year for which the report which has been read was made, said school district No. 1 levied a district tax of 5 mills on the dollar for school purposes. That made a total tax of 8 mills on the dollar. Eight mills on the dollar upon the assessed value of the taxable property in the Southern States according to the census of 1880 would provide a school fund of $18,967,386.08, which lacks $167,708.36 of being equal to the amount which would be provided for school purposes under the operations of this bill during the first year by taxation in the Southern States at the same rate that they were taxed in 1880 for school purposes added to their proportionate share of the appropriation under this bill.

It is but fair to state that the district to which I have referred includes a large portion of the city of Portland, but I still insist that if the people of the Southern States would tax themselves to the same extent that the people of the city of Portland voluntarily tax themselves for the support of schools a fund would be provided sufficient to furnish facilities for the education of all the children of school age in those States equal to those enjoyed by one-half of the members of this body during their childhood and equal to the educational facilities provided by any States in this Union fifty years ago.

While this is true, I fear that there is not that enthusiasm in some of the States for general education and that sense of the obligation of the people of the States to provide for the education of the children of the State that ought to exist. There are men in every community, men of intelligence and men of ability, who affect to believe that education for the masses is not necessary. There are men who affect to believe that the States have no right to tax the property of its citizens for general education. Sir, I would not vote to place any such man at the head of any of the educational institutions of this country. While, in view of the fact that illiteracy exists to an alarming extent in some portions of the Union, and of the further fact that there is an inability or an indisposition to provide for the education of the masses, I am willing to vote for appropriations out of the Federal Treasury for the purpose of aiding in education, I want to know before I vote to place the distribution of such appropriation under the control of the States and Territories that the people of such States and Territories believe as I do in regard to the importance of general education.

Before I am called upon to vote for such a supervision of this fund I think I am entitled to know that the States and Territories which are authorized to control its distribution are in favor of general education without distinction of race or color. And because I am not satisfied upon that point I have proposed the amendment which has been read, an amendment which affects alike all the States and Territories of the Union, and to which there should be no objection; an amendment which is intended to reserve to the General Government some sort of supervision in conjunction with the State authorities over the final distribution of this fund to the school districts and other local organizations entitled to it under the provisions of the bill.

I have been told in talking about this Southern question by representative men from the South, "You can not put yourself in our position and look upon this question as we do." I say, "You can not put yourselves in my position and look upon this question as I do." It has been said by the advocates of this bill, "We are willing to trust the South with the distribution of this fund." I disclaim any disposition to distrust or question the good faith of any of the friends of this bill, or the good intentions of any officer of a State government; and I would not unnecessarily or unjustly make any reflections against any State government, but I can not close my eyes to the history of the past. I can not be deaf to the complaints which are made against the General Government in regard to the transactions of the past and in regard to the conduct of public affairs at the present by Senators on the other side of this Chamber day after day. It is because the standpoint from which the dominant party in the South looks upon this question of the civil and political status of the colored race and upon the obligation of the States to concede to the colored man his rights guaranteed to him by the Constitution and laws of the United States and to protect him in the enjoyment of the same is so different from my own that I fear there will not be found within some of the States that enthusiasm for the education of the colored race that is necessary to insure an impartial distribution of this fund.

I was greatly pleased with what I heard from the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] and the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] in regard to the disposition of the white people of those States toward the colored race and in regard to the efforts which are being made for the education of all the illiterate classes in those States. If I could be convinced that such was the case in every portion of the Union I would be willing to vote not only $105,000,000 in ten years, but $500,000,000 in ten years. I would be willing to vote to apply a remedy equal to the evil and to the danger that is to be feared from the evil. But my present information is—I would be glad to know that I am mistaken, I would be glad to know that I have entirely misconceived the condition of the colored population in the South—my present information is that in some of the former slaveholding States, or at least in some localities in them, the colored man is practically now deprived of certain civil and political rights which have been guaranteed to him by the Constitution and laws of the Union. I will not undertake to say who has done this, I will not undertake to say who is responsible for it, but I do say that the States where those things have occurred ought to be held responsible for it, whether the State governments have been the instruments by which it has been done, whether it has been done by the connivance of the State authorities, or whether it has resulted alone from the failure on the part of the State governments to protect the colored man in his civil and political rights. I do not propose to go into a history of the condition of the colored race in the Southern States since slavery was abolished. I do not even propose to state with any degree of particularity what I understand to be the present political condition of the colored man in the South. I merely state what I understand to be the fact, that the colored man in some portions of the South is practically denied the rights already conferred upon him by law.

As I have already said, without questioning the good faith of the friends of this bill or of any members of this body, before I am called upon to vote to place the fund proposed to be appropriated by the bill under the control of a State or Territory north or south I think I am entitled to have some evidence that that State or Territory is in sympathy with the objects of the bill and will faithfully carry it into effect.

I disclaim any hostility to the South. I am glad that time is softening the animosities engendered by the war of the rebellion. I can overlook the great mistake of the South, which in the light of subsequent history proved to be a great crime against this Government; I can even admire to a certain degree the zeal and fortitude with which the people of the South contended for a bad cause; I excuse the South to some extent for not accepting at once with a good grace the results of the war; but I can not approve of a systematic attempt to nullify the laws of the United States enacted for the protection of its citizens, or of the public sentiment which justifies it. I know that I have entered upon an unpopular subject, a subject which excites but little interest in any part of the Union; but it is a subject which appears to be pertinent to the question before the Senate, and I have touched it as mildly as I could. The question, however, is not unimportant.

The relation between the colored race and the white race in the South in my view of the case is a question in which the South has a paramount interest, and is one which I believe they must themselves dispose of. If the people of this country will not listen to the discussion of it to-day, I fear the time will come when they will be compelled to listen. There is no idea so dangerous as the idea that the laws of a country may be persistently and systematically violated. Law is the bond of society; organized society is civil government, and the enforcement of law is the only safeguard which the citizen has for the protection of his rights. I am firmly convinced that there is no people which can afford to permit any class of its citizens to be deprived of their rights under the law. The oppressed of to-day may become the oppressors of to-morrow, and liberty and the future peace and prosperity of this country demand that every citizen and every class shall be protected in their rights under the law.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, in detaining the Senate for a few moments I do not wish to follow the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] into that province of which he seems to have among all the Senators upon this floor a monopoly, the raking up of the faile l and forgotten comic almanac, weak old jokes which could not even get a sale at a penny apiece to those productions when they were fresh, for the sake of composing speeches for the Senate of the United States. The Senator will enjoy that method of debating by himself, so far as I am concerned. But I think after his speech it is proper that I should call the attention of the Senate, and of any other person to whom this great and grave public question may have an interest, to precisely what has happened and the attitude in which, so far as he has been able to do it, he has put the community which he represents upon this floor.

Since I have been in public life there has been no public question in which I have taken so deep an interest, nothing to which I have devoted so much of study or of effort, as the question of aiding, so far as could be done within the proper limits of national authority, the elevation of the States of the South in that education which as I believe is not only the measure of the title of any community to rank among civilized States but is the sure product and cause of wealth, dignity, happiness, manhood, to the individual citizens of whom those States are composed.

In the other House, as is known to some gentlemen within the sound of my voice, I had the honor of introducing a measure which I submitted to the Republican leaders in that day and was informed by nearly every one of them that it was totally impracticable, but which fuller discussion and effort carried through by a decided majority, giving to the States of the South the entire proceeds of the public lands of this country forever; that is, giving those proceeds to the States according to the proportion of their illiteracy, so that nine-tenths of the benefaction would go there, a fund which in some years had yielded from five to ten million dollars. A similar bill drawn by me and every line of it mine, though reported from another committee, passed the Senate the Congress before the last, adding to the fund derived from the public lands the proceeds of the patent laws, almost wholly the contribution of the portion of the Union to which I belong. Although I had taken no active part either in the preparation or in the support of this measure, it was because I preferred that newer and stronger and better soldiers should succeed to the contest in which my interest was not in the least diminished.

I do not speak of this by way of boast either for myself or the Commonwealth which I represent. Two hundred thousand dollars only of this money will go Massachusetts; and that is to go to remove an illiteracy which is wholly with persons who come from other communities within her borders. With I suppose a little more than half our population, $1,100,000 is to go to the State of North Carolina. As I stated before, I do not say this by way of boast. I would not have the bad taste to accompany an act of generosity for myself or the community which I represent with a boast; but I think under those circumstances, when we come with this proposition in our hands asking but the simple condition from the State governments to whom it is to be given that they shall apply it for the purpose and shall tell us how they have applied it year by year, we are entitled to be met in some other way than by the method which the Senator from North Carolina adopted, and which he adopted before I had addressed the Senate at all upon this question.

Let me read what the Senator from North Carolina said to this proposition. It was not his answer to any man's speech. The Senator from Kansas had said nothing except in criticism of some detail found in a section of the pending measure. It was not his answer to Massachusetts. It was his answer to this bill, which gives $11,000,000 or thereabouts to the States for which he especially spoke, and $2,000,000 only or thereabouts to the other twenty-seven States of the Union.

Here is what the Senator from North Carolina said:

> Mr. President, it was my intention originally to have said not a word on this bill. There was no particular call for it from the State which I represent; and it was looked upon as a voluntary offering upon the part of the people of the North.
> There are some things that can not be denied in connection with this matter.

He proceeded:

> It is true that the people of the North set free the colored people in the South. It is true that they not only freed them without any preparation for their new state, but that they conferred upon them the highest rights of an American citizen. * * * When constitutional amendments and penal acts were not of sufficient avail they forced the colored people into positions of equality if not superiority with the white people of the South by the use of the bayonet. * * * They knew that it meant a dilution of or an infusion into the right of suffrage of a vast element of ignorance and vice. * * * They knew that it meant a surrender of several of the States of the South to the absolute control of this colored majority, and they knew that it meant * * * the actual endangering of all the institutions which the white people of the South had built up, and even, in their opinion, of their civilization itself.

He is not stating his opinion, but that is his answer to our proposition, that we did this thing with the knowledge, with the infamous and guilty knowledge, of these terrible results which he said were to follow from our policy:

> When we were told that, and exhorted to patience, it was known to our friends on the other side likewise that we were unable to impart that education to those people; that in the struggle which set them free and in the subsequent eras of carpet-bagism and rapine we were so impoverished and so destroyed financially that we were absolutely unable to so tax ourselves as to impart the blessings of education to those people. That was also well known.
> At the same time that we were thus suffering under the evils of poverty and this infliction of the infusion of ignorance and vice into the suffrage and into the management of our affairs, we were held by the people of the North to the same rigid accountability for our public conduct as was exacted from the most highly educated communities; * * * and upon the slightest pretense you investigated us, and continue to investigate us, notwithstanding you say that the evils under which we suffered and all evils in government originate from the want of sufficient education of the masses.

Then he says:

> After this state of things has endured nearly twenty years, at last a portion of the people of the North through their representatives in Congress awoke to their duty. One honorable Senator in this body at least bethought him of the panacea, and he brings in the bill * * * for the purpose of removing the great evil under which the people of the South have suffered.

Then he goes on to taunt the other States with having received a large share of the public lands and states to the rest of us that we must learn to help ourselves:

> We will help ourselves if you will take your hands off of us. If you will let us alone we will agree to help ourselves. If you will quit taxing us to support your factories in the North—

North Carolina with its vast and magnificent water-power—

> we will agree to help ourselves. * * * If you will doctor your own sick cows and calves we will help ourselves. It comes with a very bad grace indeed from a portion of the country where all the fortunes that have been accumulated have been accumulated by making everybody help them by universal taxation for private benefit, to come here when there is a proposition to help the colored people * * * and say to us, "Well, you must help yourselves."

> Mr. President, I do not expect this bill to pass; I have no idea that it will pass. I have always doubted, and I say it with proper Senatorial courtesy, the professions of many gentlemen on the other side when they were so interested about the improvement, moral and intellectual, of the colored race in the South. While they would send emissaries among them and band them together for political partisan purposes, and pat them on the back and urge them forward in the name of freedom and advancement, &c., to the polls, I have always believed that when it came to doing something really for the benefit of that people there would be flinching, and I am not disappointed at finding it.

And so on.

I should like to know if there is any Senator on this floor, from the South or the North, the East or the West, who, whatever he might think of the principle of this bill or however earnest might be his convictions of the misconduct of his political associates, is capable of meeting a measure of generosity, of liberality, of large expenditure, by such a slap in the face and such an insult as was contained in the original speech of the Senator from North Carolina. I do not believe that the Senator can find among his political associates a Senator who will rise in his place and say that under the circumstances he considers that speech a decent and a fitting thing to have said, whatever may be the intensity of political feeling.

Now, Mr. President, let us come to what I said. Senators upon my side of the Chamber thought that this bill was not sufficiently guarded in two respects: that it did not secure the application of the money to the purpose for which it was designed, and that it did not leave the United States Government that annual control over appropriations from the public Treasury which our theory of frequent elections of their representatives by the people implies. I rose to answer that proposition, and I answered it as well as I knew how. I said that this little safeguard of requiring an annual report of the number of children attending public schools was the magician's wand by which Horace Mann had revolutionized the public-school system of Massachusetts, and that when any town found itself lowest in the scale, somebody in that town went to work to remove that disgrace from the town of which he was a citizen. I said that the effect had been that it had multiplied by fifteen, I think, the appropriation per capita for the public-school system of Massachusetts, and I added, with no intention of boasting, that the State then as now headed the column of Commonwealths in this country. It was proper to say, in speaking of the success of this apparently feeble and simple provision, that it had caused the success of that community which was most successful. I do not believe any person who heard the sound of my voice except the Senator from North Carolina construed that as a boast. Then I added, at which he seems to have taken offense, in speaking of the present condition of North Carolina or of any other State, that if in the future North Carolina should at any time find herself the tail State in this matter (perhaps not a very tasteful phrase, but it was the one which came into my head at the moment), I thought she would set to work to get out of that position, and we should not hear such speeches as we had heard from her Senator the other day.

That is the whole of this story. It is all that had happened until the Senator from North Carolina rose to make the speech that we have heard.

Mr. JONAS. Mr. President——

Mr. VANCE. I hope the Senator from Louisiana, before he proceeds, will just allow me to say that I concur in the greater part of everything that the Senator from Massachusetts has said; that is to say, in all that part of his speech which consisted in reading from mine I am heartily with him.

Mr. JONAS. Mr. President, I had intended to content myself with casting a silent vote in favor of this measure. It is one which my people approve and favor, one which I favor, and have from its inception. I think great credit is due to the very able chairman of the committee which has presented this measure, and to the Senators associated with him or their efforts in bringing it before the Senate and the country, for the diligence which they have displayed in collecting facts and statistics to present to the Senate and the country, and for their single-minded efforts in behalf of a cause which is not only dear to the people of my State, but which has become a measure of necessity to the people of one-half of the States of this Union, if not in some manner to them all.

I accept this bill in behalf of the people whom I in part represent as a great benefaction, as a great assistance to a people overburdened by a charge laid upon them which they are unable to meet, but which they have every disposition to carry out to the very best of their ability. The State of Louisiana figures far down in the roll of States charged with having a large illiterate population. I do not intend to go into details that have been discussed over and over again to show why this great illiteracy exists, certainly not by our fault, and certainly any one who has studied the history of the Southern States since the war, who is familiar with the struggle which those people have made to regain their former prosperity, who considers the burden of debt and taxation under which they have been staggering, who considers the immense amount of property which was swept away and destroyed in the civil revolution in which they were engaged, must recognize the inability of that people to fulfill the duty which they owe, and I admit it, to give the children living within their States the benefit of education and to qualify them for the enjoyment of the privileges and the performance of the duties of citizens.

Therefore I intended to vote for the bill without saying a word in its favor, believing that its manifold merits had been fully set forth by the Senator who had it in charge. But I can not remain in my seat and be silent as to charges which have been made against the people of my State as well as the other States of the South by Senators who have spoken in opposition to the bill, on the other side of the Chamber, yesterday and to-day.

The distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] last evening approached the consideration of the bill with that cool deliberation which always characterizes him. He expressed the most generous sentiments towards the people of the South; he had nothing but pity and sympathy for them in their misfortunes; he advocated the general object and character of the bill, vindicated its constitutionality, assumed the duty which he said rested upon the people of the country to educate those ignorant people, the emancipated slaves and their children, and then proceeded to give reasons why he could not vote for the bill, reasons in search of which he went back into the days immediately after the war, and raked up the history of the period of reconstruction, the killing of Abraham Lincoln, the turpitudes and tergiversations of Andrew Johnson, the passage of the constitutional amendments, the necessity which rested upon the political party then in power to give the ballot to the emancipated slaves, winding up by the intimation that it was unsafe at the present time to put the control of the expenditure of this money in the hands of the people of the South, intimating that at this day, nearly twenty years after the events of which he was speaking, after the results of the war had been fully accepted, after the constitutional amendments had been recognized and accepted as fully at the South as at the North, giving as his reasons for opposing the bill that the South could not be trusted to administer this fund unless some amendments are made to the bill by which Federal machinery can be carried into the States to control its administration and its distribution.

To-day the Senator from the far-off State of Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] also in a mild and brotherly manner has expressed his sympathy with the South, his friendship for the South, his affection for its people, his admiration for the stand which they took and maintained for nearly four years in a mistaken cause, his admiration for the manner in which they accepted the results of the ruin and downfall of that cause, his admiration for the manner in which they accepted the measures of reconstruction, and yet, with all this, he has taken upon himself to make insinuations and charges against those States and their people of the most injurious and calumnious character. Without specifying one single charge or giving one single source of information, he has assumed to say that we set aside and tread upon the constitutional amendments; he has assumed to say that we deprive one class of the people of their constitutional and civil rights; he has assumed to express his belief that we will not faithfully administer this fund if confided to us for the purpose of educating the colored people. He has said, with all his generous sympathy for us, that he has manifold reasons for believing and knowing all these things, and yet he has not made one specific charge nor given one single and solitary fact. His speech couched in honeyed words was full of gall and bitterness. He professes that his feelings are those of beneficence toward the people of the South, and yet he stabs them in their tenderest sensibilities without giving any reasons or any facts, but intimating that he has some secret source of information which convinces him that those people who have borne so much, submitted to so much, and vindicated their claim to patience and to manhood through so many years, can not be trusted with the administration of this benefaction which this bill proposes to give to them, not for themselves but for the purpose of educating the ignorant, the uncultivated wards of the nation, whom you have made their citizens and suffragans.

Mr. President, I deny these charges, baseless as they are, as calumnies, as slanderous imputations upon the people whom I in part represent. I say that to the best of our ability in the State of Louisiana, and I believe throughout the South, we have striven to do equal justice to the colored man with the white; that in the matter of education we have opened our schools to both classes alike. Small as our means have been, humble as our efforts have been from want of means to make them greater, we have divided equally with the colored race. We have given them equal school-houses, teachers of equal capacity, and an equal distribution of the school fund in proportion to their population, and have striven to the best of our poor ability to give them the benefits of education.

Whose interest is it that those people should be educated? From the North comes for them a profound sympathy. You sympathize with them for their former condition of slavery, you sympathize with them for their ignorance, you sympathize with them for their poverty; but they are our fellow-citizens and are living among us. We meet them in the walks of every-day life. They are our neighbors, they pervade the streets of our cities, they live in our villages, and they cultivate our farms and fields; they mix with our families, they mix with our children, they vote at the polls, and to a large extent control our elections. The presiding officer [Mr. FRYE in the chair] shakes his head. I think if he couches that shake of the head in the same language as the Senator from Oregon I can disprove it so far as the State which I represent is concerned. It is to the interest of our people that we should educate that population. Ignorant and uneducated, they are dangerous to our civilization, dangerous to our safety, dangerous to our peace, dangerous to our prosperity. It is to our interest to educate them, to qualify them for those duties of citizenship which you have bestowed upon them, and for which, as certainly you will admit yourselves, they are incapacitated.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him a moment for a question?

Mr. JONAS. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. Did I understand the Senator to express the opinion that the colored people of the South controlled the elections of that section?

Mr. JONAS. They do in some sections where they have the numerical right to control, and they control them in some instances in the interest of the Democratic party; but they vote freely; they vote as they please. I am aware that if they vote for the Democratic party the Senator does not consider, and will not believe, that they exercise their civil rights, but they vote as they please.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator greatly misrepresents me.

Mr. JONAS. If I do I take it all back. I have no desire to misrepresent the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. I have but one desire, and that is that everybody in the South as well as in the North, every black man as well as white man, shall express his own convictions by a free and untrammeled ballot, which shall be fairly counted.

Mr. JONAS. I shake hands with the Senator; and that his ballot may be free and untrammeled and may be intelligent, I want to give the blessings of education to him and his children. I want to qualify all for the exercise of that right intelligently; and therefore I accept the benefaction which you bring us. We are unable to give them education, and I welcome this aid.

Mr President, it is a necessity, I repeat again, to us that these people should be educated. Therefore I repel the insinuation which has been made that the people of the South, or at least that part of the people of the South that I represent, will be faithless to this trust if confided to them.

Why, my friend who is in the chair [Mr. FRYE] knows that the evidence taken by the committee that examined into the affairs of the far-famed county of Copiah proved, if it proved nothing else, that the benefits of education, to the utmost limit of the capacity of that people, were extended to both races alike. It was proven before that committee that they had an equal number of school-houses, an equal number of teachers, an equal distribution of the school fund in proportion to their numbers, and every facility was accorded to them for education that was accorded to the white people. I believe this is the case all over the South. I know it is the case in my State.

I shall welcome the day when the assistance of the National Government, which you give by this bill, will enable us to afford universal education; but without this bill I hope and believe the time will come when we shall have greater prosperity, and will be able to raise ourselves the necessary funds with which to give the blessings of education to every man, woman, and child in our State, no matter what his or her race, color, or previous condition, and in this hope I am expressing the unanimous feeling of the people whom I in part represent.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I have no desire to enter into any crimination or recrimination with reference to this bill. I have no fault to find with anybody; I have no apologies to make to anybody; but I shall, with the indulgence of the Senate, in my plain way, state my reasons for voting against this bill.

A good deal has been said in this debate as to what the Southern people have done in the way of educating the colored race and the white race. I think some injustice has been done to that section; I hope not intentionally, I hope not from any improper spirit or a spirit of bitterness or partisanship. And I think that some injustice has been done that section by our friends on this side of the Chamber.

In my own State I propose, with the indulgence of the Senate, to show what that State has done in aid of education in the last six or eight years. There are in round numbers about 280,000 children of school age within the limits of the State. Of that number there is an annual attendance of about 173,000 upon the common schools, leaving about 108,000 who do not appear to attend the common schools; but it must not be forgotten that, in addition to the common schools, there are a number of private schools which absorb a good many of the children of school age, and, as my friend from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] suggests, that is so throughout the South. I have no doubt that is true all over the South.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him just one moment?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. BLAIR. In the whole country there are only 500,000 attending private schools of every description, and the larger proportion of them are in the Northern States.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not know how many are attending private schools in the Northern States. In fact, I have no specific knowledge upon the subject in any of the States; but I submit it is a fair inference.

Mr. BLAIR. There are eighteen if not twenty million children a year to be educated. About one child in twenty goes to private schools.

Mr. BUTLER. But to return to my proposition. I say that out of 280,000 children of school age, black and white, in South Carolina, 173,000 annually attend the common schools, and, of course, the private schools must absorb quite a number of children of that age. This common-school system is, I believe, as good as is to be found in any State in the United States. The common-school system of my State, I repeat, is in my judgment as good a system as there is on the American continent. The people of that State tax themselves by a constitutional provision, not relying upon the annual appropriation by the Legislature more or less each year. They tax themselves by a constitutional provision 2 mills, which is devoted exclusively to educational purposes. In addition to that is the money resulting from the poll-tax, making in the aggregate about $500,000. The assessed valuation of property is, I believe, about $133,000,000.

In addition to that the State appropriates—perhaps my colleague will remind me, I forget how much—to the university of the State, $20,000?

Mr. HAMPTON. Twenty-four thousand dollars.

Mr. BUTLER. Twenty-four thousand dollars to the State university in Columbia. It appropriates about $15,000 or $20,000 to the Citadel Academy in Charleston. In addition to that, in different localities of the State there are what are called graded schools, that is to say, schools that are kept up in a large measure by local taxation, and those schools are increasing in number as the years roll on, and I venture to say that there are some that will compare favorably with any schools of that class in the United States.

Besides, there is an annual meeting of what is known as the teachers' normal school, which was inaugurated about three years ago under the admirable administration of our present governor. It met first in Greenville, subsequently at Spartanburg, and last year in Columbia. The school is made up of teachers, there being a white normal school and a colored normal school for teachers. They meet and remain in session from four to six weeks. They are attended by the most advanced, progressive teachers to be found in the land. I want to read now in this connection the report of a colored man, the report of Professor H. P. Montgomery, principal of the Normal Institute for Colored Teachers:

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 10, 1883.

Hon. A. COWARD,
State Superintendent of Education:

DEAR SIR: I herewith forward my report of the Normal Institute held at Columbia during the month of July.

The institute was opened on Thursday, July 5, with prayer by Rev. E. M. Pinckney. In the absence of his excellency Governor Thompson, who was to make the opening address, the secretary, Mr. Thomas J. Gregory, introduced the superintendent, who stated that the governor was unavoidably detained by official business, but would address the teachers on the following morning.

He then goes on to give a report of the proceedings of that school and closes with this statement:

Among those who visited the institute were his excellency Governor Thompson, Mayor Rhett, Colonel McMaster, Postmaster Wilder—

A colored man—

Rev. E. Pinckney, Rev. E. M. Brawley, Rev. M. G. Johnson, and Professor D. A. Straker.

His honor Mayor Rhett welcomed the teachers to Columbia, and expressed great sympathy for the work.

Professor Joynes, of the University of South Carolina, kindly consented to give one of his excellent lectures on language.

To the press and citizens of Columbia we feel deeply indebted for the hospitality and kind treatment enjoyed while among them.

On behalf of the teachers, myself, and faculty, I tender to you thanks for your co-operation and sympathy as shown by your almost daily attendance and stirring addresses.

Very respectfully,

H. P. MONTGOMERY,
Principal.

Mr. President, what an overwhelming and conclusive reply that is, coming from a colored man, a teacher in the city of Washington, to the intimation which has been made on this floor that the Southern States have not contributed properly to the education of the colored people. The spirit of the white people, as shown by this report, is the prevailing sentiment throughout the State. Why, sir, we have taxed ourselves and do tax ourselves and pay the taxes annually and faithfully, and 95 per cent. of the money raised for school purposes is paid by the white people, the property-owners, and the colored people get their full share of it, not only of the 95 per cent., but these very gentlemen, Colonel Coward (our accomplished and zealous State superintendent of education), Governor Thompson, Professor Joynes, and all thinking, progressive, humane men in that State, contribute their advice, their encouragement, their countenance to the colored children in the colored schools wherever they are found and wherever they have an opportunity.

I say, therefore, Mr. President, that the charge is unfair, it is wrong, it is cruel, it is untrue and unjust when it is stated that the Southern people have not done their utmost to educate not only the negroes but the white children. Education is a good thing; and I was struck with the statement of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] about that old colored man who came into the Federal camp and, after doing a hard day's work, would read by the light of a pine-knot from a spelling-book, hungering and thirsting after knowledge. It was a touching incident, and illustrative of that old man's ardent desire for knowledge; but that Senator does not know perhaps that many, many of both races since that tragic period have hungered for meat and bread; many, white and black, have had to drive the wolf of starvation from their doors, and yet they have made no complaint; I make none now. Our struggle has been a terrific one in solving a problem that in its difficulties and in its perils is without a parallel in the history of the Caucasian race since the foundation of civilized society. We have made mistakes, no doubt, and may make mistakes in the future; it is human to err; and summoning to our aid all the philosophy and all the sagacity and all the patriotism, all the humanity and wisdom which we may, as long as human nature is as weak as it is we are liable to make mistakes in the future in dealing with this race question and in solving it. But, sir, we want to solve it upon principles enduring and humane and honest if we can. If I know my own heart and the hearts of those for whom I may venture to speak, there is not a throb that does not wish to deal faithfully and humanely and kindly with this difficult question.

And now, sir, the showing made of illiteracy against the South I think has not been fairly stated. That illiteracy is based, as the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] indicated the other day, upon all the people, old and young. Of course the slaves were illiterate from the very nature of the institution, and that illiteracy can never be removed from them. Yet they are counted among the illiterates of the South. Of course they were illiterate and are illiterate, but I believe going on as we now are in the South, the next census will show a very largely reduced illiteracy in that section, because the older colored men are passing away, and as they pass away of course the illiteracy is reduced.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me a word right there?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to say that in discussing one aspect of this bill on a former occasion I called attention to that particular point, stating the fact that in my judgment this bill did not meet it fairly, for the reason that the appropriation was based on the illiteracy of the whole people and not the illiteracy of those of school age, which ought to be, in my judgment, the basis of the enumeration for the estimate to be made for the distribution of the money.

Mr. BUTLER. I agree with the Senator entirely, because the older men who were slaves, as I stated a while ago, of course are illiterate and will continue to their graves to be so, but I believe that if a fair enumeration could be taken now of the illiterate children or of those who have grown up since emancipation, that enumeration would show a very different state of things; for as the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] said the other day, the colored people seem to be getting along very well, and he did not know, perhaps he did not appreciate, what a compliment he was paying by that statement to the white people of the South. This statement of that Senator discloses the fact that they are neglecting to educate their own children, and are contributing their money to educate the colored children. They are getting on very well, he says, but the trouble is with the white people, and I believe he stated that in my State there was an illiteracy to the extent of 22 per cent. The illiteracy among the colored people is 78 per cent. in South Carolina, but a large majority of that illiteracy, as I stated, can be charged to the grown-up men who were slaves.

But, Mr. President, what is education? What is illiteracy? Every illiterate man is not necessarily an ignorant man. One of the wisest men within my acquaintance in my county, one of the most progressive, one of the most practical, one of the most public-spirited and patriotic citizens in that county can not read or sign his name. No, sir, literacy—if I may use the word—is not wisdom. It is not invariably accompanied by honor and truth and courage. A man may be illiterate in the ordinary acceptation of that term and yet highly educated in all those qualities that go to make up true manhood. I have in my mind now a half-dozen men of that character, worthy associates of the most pretentious of the literati, the superiors of many of them. Therefore, when you talk about illiteracy you ought to discriminate between an illiterate and an ignorant man, for an illiterate man is not necessarily ignorant. He may be a very wise one, and a literate man may be a great fool. As my friend from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] suggests, we should distinguish between intelligence, mental power, and mere book learning. Education is defined:

> The act of developing and cultivating the various physical, intellectual, and moral faculties; formation of the manners and improvement of the mind; instruction, tuition, nurture, breeding.

Education does not consist in simply cramming letters into the mind of a child; and I want to say right here that we had better pause, we had better hesitate and not run away with ourselves in this desire to remove the illiteracy of this country, for fear that you may strike at the very foundation-stone of our institutions by destroying the education which grows out of the family relation. I do not say this to excuse or justify or encourage the want of learning and knowledge. I would encourage it, I would send the light of knowledge and learning and illuminate the mind of every child in this country if I could; but there is a training more important than the training of the school-house, and that is the training of the family, where the character and honor and integrity and honesty of a man are instilled into him. Therefore, in going forward with this (I say it without disrespect) undue haste and zeal, taking the enormous sum of $15,000,000 out of the Treasury of the United States to aid the States, I say that we ought to pause and reflect, for fear we do what I have just indicated and for fear that we do what was intimated by the Senator from Indiana, that in throwing this large amount of money into the States you do not check the effort in those States to develop their own common-school system in their own way.

Why, Mr. President, there is no success in life comparable to the success which results from individual effort, none so enduring, none so satisfactory. I would therefore be very cautious before I would appropriate $15,000,000 and put it with the States, the effect of which I am afraid would be, among others, to induce every man—not every man; perhaps that is extravagant—but a very great many men who are now earnestly struggling to build up their own local institutions to put their hands in their pockets and say, "The General Government is going to educate everybody. What is the use of paying any more taxes for education?" That, I say, is my impression. I may be wrong; I hope I am; but it is worth considering.

Now, sir, there is an institution in my State known as the Claflin University, endowed by a philanthropic gentleman, I believe, of the State of Massachusetts, or perhaps of New York—I forget which—dedicated entirely to colored people, and I observe in the report of the superintendent of education upon that college, which I hold in my hand, he says that a number of the students are sustaining themselves in college by day labor.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator seems to be apprehensive of the injurious effect upon local ambition and self-stimulus of the communities that receive this money. If the distribution of the $15,000,000 should be made, then each school-child in South Carolina would have $5, while the child has $20 in Massachusetts. But the point which I wish to call the Senator's attention to particularly is this, which he now seems approaching: The expenditures of which he is now speaking are in the purest sense, of course, charities; religious charities. I was going to ask him if he thinks that the experience of the last fifteen years in the distribution of the Peabody fund, which is one charity, the proposed distribution of the Slater fund and other charities, amounting in all, as I have heard it stated by the representatives of the religious denominations of the country, to probably at least $50,000,000 put into the South since the close of the war as a result of private or denominational religious charity, has been, on the whole, injurious to that local effort of which he speaks?

Mr. BUTLER. I do not think that answers the point I was making, because that was a private charity and of course limited and fixed.

Mr. BLAIR. Does the Senator think that there is any real distinction between a dollar coming from the national Treasury and applied to the purpose of education, and one coming from individuals residing in the country?

Mr. BUTLER. Of course I do. I think there is a very great difference. As I said a while ago, these charities are limited, the amounts are stated, and all institutions accepting them accept them with a distinct understanding that they are not to be increased. But suppose we take this $15,000,000 and put $1,000,000 of it in South Carolina, and this very institution that I refer to should get $150,000—I do not know whether the scheme of his bill provides for that, but suppose, for the purpose of illustration, it should receive $150,000—does not the Senator know perfectly well that it would paralyze very largely and check the efforts of individuals to keep it up? I want now to read what I think is very commendable:

> Claflin college of agriculture was established in 1872 as a co-ordinate department of the university. A farm of one hundred and fifty acres is cultivated mostly by student labor, under a superintendent. Many students support themselves largely by labor, for which they are paid in cash. This department is supported principally by the income arising from the sale of lands granted by act of Congress for the encouragement of industrial education. The normal school went into operation in 1877.

I beg to say that if you would put at the disposal of that institution $100,000 annually for ten years all the individual effort of that kind which I think so commendable would cease in a large measure. I mention that simply by way of illustration.

Mr. BLAIR. This is confined to the common schools; that is not included.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand that, but the same principle in my judgment would obtain as to the common schools. But we are not so far behind in education in South Carolina. One would suppose from the debate that we were benighted, in the depths of a hopeless despair, on the verge of a savage state, incurably illiterate and ignorant, and beset by a very demon of darkness. Why, Mr. President, I feel rather inclined to boast of the educational institutions of my State. As I said a while ago, we contribute as much as we can contribute in the 2-mill tax upon the assessed value of the property, and I will show after a while that that is increasing and has increased. But there are in my State, in addition, some other institutions of education.

Mr. HOAR. I want at some time in the Senator's remarks to call his attention to the statistics of South Carolina in regard to one subject he has touched upon; that is, the fact that they are doing their full share and more for the colored people. I wish to ask him whether the statistics do not show the necessity of aid? It may be convenient for me to do it now.

Mr. BUTLER. Very well.

Mr. HOAR. I understand the Senator now to say that they are doing in his State (and I have no doubt he is thoroughly informed and correct on that subject) all they can, and that although the white people pay a large portion, 95 per cent. I think he said, of the whole tax, the colored people get their full share. I want to point out to the Senator how that is working.

The whole percentage of the white persons 10 years of age and upward in South Carolina who are illiterate, unable to read, is 21.9 per cent.

Mr. BUTLER. Twenty-two per cent., in round numbers.

Mr. HOAR. While the percentage of the persons between 10 and 14 years of age in South Carolina who are unable to write is 33.9. So the illiteracy is increasing among the whites of that State. In most other States it is very different. For instance, in Pennsylvania the illiteracy over 10 years of age is 6.7 per cent., while of those between 10 and 14 it is only 4.1 per cent. In Massachusetts the illiteracy of all over 10, including foreigners, is 6.4, while the illiteracy of those between 10 and 14 is only 1.2 per cent., about one-sixth as large.

When you get to the colored people in South Carolina the illiteracy of all the colored people of 10 years of age and upward is 78.5 per cent., while the illiteracy of the colored people between 10 and 14 is only 74.1, or about 4½ per cent. less.

Now, the point is that South Carolina, doing all she can, doing her full share for the colored people, still the limit of her ability at present is such that the actual illiteracy of the white people is increasing, if the census be correct, while in the Northern States, where they have had old common-school systems, their illiteracy is very much less in the children between 10 and 14 than in persons over 10. If South Carolina can not accept this benefaction from the country to enable her to relieve somewhat this burden under which she is staggering, what is her prospect as to her white people? I beg the Senator to be assured that I put this question as a fair argument simply, not to call attention to the facts.

Mr. BUTLER. I accept it as such. I admit, Mr. President, that the prospect is not very bright. I admit that; but I am inclined to hope that when I have furnished some other information which I propose to give the Senator he will concur with me that the prospect of the future is not so bad as at first appears on the face of the figures. I had not gone into the details of the figures as closely as he appears to have done, but I was in hopes that the illiteracy was diminishing with children of the school age, and I am inclined to think it is.

Mr. HOAR. According to the census it is not far changed; but the illiteracy of the colored people is diminishing, perhaps on account of the fact that the old slaves the Senator spoke of are disappearing.

Mr. BUTLER. This much must be said—and I desire the Senator to understand that I am not making this statement in any partisan sense—that the improvements in the common schools, the improvement in all the educational institutions in my State have gotten, if I may use the expression, a fresh start within the last three or four years. When my colleague [Mr. HAMPTON] was elected governor of the State in 1876 we inherited an enormous debt from his predecessor. I will not undertake to say now how much my own county owed on account of the money that had been stolen from the school fund, for I do not now remember, but it was quite a large sum. We not only had to make up the necessary funds for carrying on the common schools, but we had also to pay a county tax of so much every year to pay the past indebtedness which we inherited from the predecessor of my colleague.

Mr. HAMPTON. My colleague will allow me to interrupt him for a moment.

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. HAMPTON. There was a debt of over $400,000 due to the school fund at the time Superintendent Thompson took charge of it.

Mr. BUTLER. I knew it was some large amount. I am much obliged to my colleague for the information. I knew that we were heavily handicapped by this indebtedness inherited from our Republican predecessors; so that we had to raise by taxation the sum necessary to retire that past indebtedness, and at the same time provide for carrying on the common-school system from year to year.

I find in the report of the superintendent of education that the common schools last year were open four months in the year, and I believe that is about as long as the average session in most of the States, except perhaps New York, Massachusetts, and some of the New England States. What is the session in Iowa?

Mr. ALLISON. About five months.

Mr. BUTLER. About five months in Iowa. My friend says that in Iowa the school session is five months, where, as I understood him to say the other day, they spend $5,000,000 for educational purposes. We spend half a million dollars, and we keep the schools open for four months in the year, with an average annual attendance of 173,095 children. I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to that fact of this past indebtedness in view of the difficulties under which we labor. That indebtedness is, I believe, about paid off, and I think and hope that we are going to get out of those difficulties, not only in reference to the common-school system, but to all the other educational institutions. There is in the University of South Carolina, supported by the State, that was opened within the last few years, without a student from 1876 to 1880, an annual attendance of one hundred and eighty-five. There is the Claflin University, with an annual attendance of two hundred and seventy-four. There is the Citadel Academy, with an annual attendance of one hundred and eighty-nine, sixty-eight of those being beneficiaries sent from the various counties. In addition to that we have the Charleston College, an old, venerable institution of the city of Charleston. We have the Furman University at Greenville, Wofford College at Spartanburg, Erskine College at Due West. We have the King's Mountain Military School in York County, the Newberry College at Newberry, the Adger College at Walhalla, besides others of a smaller character, with a number of very prosperous female institutions.

So our educational facilities and advantages are not confined to the common schools, and my apprehension is that if we take our share of this $15,000,000 and put it into that State, while I admit it might be of great service, it might be of great disadvantage to us. That is my apprehension; and I believe I prefer that we should go on with the difficulties that at present surround us and see if we can not overcome them by our own efforts, at least for a while longer.

And, Mr. President, the South is not so desperately poor, is not in such a bad condition. Let me give some facts and figures, compiled with great care at much expense and trouble and with most commendable public spirit by the Charleston News and Courier, and I believe are as correct as such a compilation can be. I cite these figures and facts to show that the property assessed for taxation is gradually increasing in value every year. Look at the matter of cotton manufactures, which, by the way, are exempted by the State from taxation for ten years from their establishment:

The increase in product in three years is 170 per cent., and the increase in actual capacity is considerably more. This is astonishing, but it is the fact There is no reason why the product of the South Carolina mills in 1890 should not be $27,000,000 to $30,000,000.

The number of spindles and looms in 1880 and 1884 is given below:

| | Spindles. | Looms. |
|---|---|---|
| 1880 | 82,334 | 1,676 |
| 1884 | 195,112 | 3,652 |

In 1881-'83 $25,000,000 were paid for machinery for cotton mills in the South, and $7,500,000 of this amount was the additional cost caused by protective duties. But for this drawback the South could have built an additional number of mills and have increased her wealth still further.

Now, sir, I venture to say, in passing, if the General Government will relieve that State of this $7,500,000 and similar burdens in the future it would be far more profitable and acceptable than this proposed appropriation of the Treasury in aid of education. The cotton factory is a good school-house in itself.

Again, in the matter of lumber and naval stores there has been an increase in the value of the product of those two industries of 100 per cent., the products amounting in 1884 to $4,394,692, being in less than four years an increase of 100 per cent. What has been the increase in manufactured products?

The figures for previous periods indicate a growth which is as astonishing as it is gratifying. The whole value of manufactured products in South Carolina at the periods named was as follows:

|---|---|
| 1860 | $8,615,195 |
| 1870 | 9,858,981 |
| 1880 | 16,738,008 |
| 1884 | 32,324,404 |

Showing an increase of $16,000,000 in three years. A great increase has gone on in agriculture. The estimate of this year's crop has been—and I will state that by way of comparison between 1860 and 1884—

|---|---|
| Cotton bales in 1860, before the emancipation of slaves | 353,412 |
| In 1884 it is estimated at | 700,000 |
| Corn, in bushels, 1860 | 15,635,606 |
| In 1884 | 19,210,000 |

and so on with other cereals and crops. The phosphate interests, land and marine, have advanced from 20,000 tons in 1868-'70 to 355,000 tons in 1883; valued for the last-named year at $2,100,000.

And there is a reviving interest and activity in gold-mining, in the great improvement in farm and domestic animals, labor-saving machinery, diversified and intensified agriculture, as the following recapitulation will show:

RECAPITULATION.

To exhibit fully the value of agricultural, manufacturing, and mining products the following tables have been prepared, the values for 1870 having been reduced to the gold standard, at the rate of 120:

|---|---|
| 1860: | |
| Agriculture | $45,823,512 |
| Manufactures | 8,615,195 |
| Mines and quarries | 17,000 |
| | 54,455,707 |
| 1870: | |
| Agriculture | 34,924,585 |
| Manufactures | 8,215,918 |
| Mines and quarries | 16,573 |
| | 43,157,076 |
| 1880: | |
| Agriculture | 41,969,749 |
| Manufactures | 16,738,008 |
| Mines and quarries | 1,180,805 |
| | 59,888,562 |
| 1883: | |
| Agriculture | 41,790,321 |
| Manufactures | 32,324,404 |
| Mines and quarries | 2,440,000 |
| | 76,554,725 |

FINAL RECAPITULATION.

The whole value of agricultural, manufacturing, and mining products for the last twenty-three years is as follows:

|---|---|
| 1860 | $54,455,707 |
| 1870 | 43,157,076 |
| 1880 | 59,888,562 |
| 1883 | 76,554,725 |

In other words, after all the losses of the war and with free labor, the gross income of South Carolina from the sources named was 50 per cent. greater than it was in 1860.

So, Mr. President, I am not prepared to admit, because I do not believe it is true, that we are in such desperate straits in the South that we can not provide schools with proper effort on our own part (which think has not been fairly stated. That illiteracy is based, as the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] indicated the other day, upon all the people, old and young. Of course the slaves were illiterate from the very nature of the institution, and that illiteracy can never be removed from them. Yet they are counted among the illiterates of the South. Of course they were illiterate and are illiterate, but I believe going on as we now are in the South, the next census will show a very largely reduced illiteracy in that section, because the older colored men are passing away, and as they pass away of course the illiteracy is reduced.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me a word right there?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to say that in discussing one aspect of this bill on a former occasion I called attention to that particular point, stating the fact that in my judgment this bill did not meet it fairly, for the reason that the appropriation was based on the illiteracy of the whole people and not the illiteracy of those of school age, which ought to be, in my judgment, the basis of the enumeration for the estimate to be made for the distribution of the money.

Mr. BUTLER. I agree with the Senator entirely, because the older men who were slaves, as I stated a while ago, of course are illiterate and will continue to their graves to be so, but I believe that if a fair enumeration could be taken now of the illiterate children or of those who have grown up since emancipation, that enumeration would show a very different state of things; for as the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] said the other day, the colored people seem to be getting along very well, and he did not know, perhaps he did not appreciate, what a compliment he was paying by that statement to the white people of the South. This statement of that Senator discloses the fact that they are neglecting to educate their own children, and are contributing their money to educate the colored children. They are getting on very well, he says, but the trouble is with the white people, and I believe he stated that in my State there was an illiteracy to the extent of 22 per cent. The illiteracy among the colored people is 78 per cent. in South Carolina, but a large majority of that illiteracy, as I stated, can be charged to the grown-up men who were slaves.

But, Mr. President, what is education? What is illiteracy? Every illiterate man is not necessarily an ignorant man. One of the wisest men within my acquaintance in my county, one of the most progressive, one of the most practical, one of the most public-spirited and patriotic citizens in that county can not read or sign his name. No, sir, literacy—if I may use the word—is not wisdom. It is not invariably accompanied by honor and truth and courage. A man may be illiterate in the ordinary acceptation of that term and yet highly educated in all those qualities that go to make up true manhood. I have in my mind now a half-dozen men of that character, worthy associates of the most pretentiousof the literati, the superiors of many of them. Therefore, when you talk about illiteracy you ought to discriminate between an illiterate and an ignorant man, for an illiterate man is not necessarily ignorant. He may be a very wise one, and a literate man may be a great fool. As my friend from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] suggests, we should distinguish between intelligence, mental power, and mere book learning. Education is defined:

> The act of developing and cultivating the various physical, intellectual, and moral faculties; formation of the manners and improvement of the mind; instruction, tuition, nurture, breeding.

Education does not consist in simply cramming letters into the mind of a child; and I want to say right here that we had better pause, we had better hesitate and not run away with ourselves in this desire to remove the illiteracy of this country, for fear that you may strike at the very foundation-stone of our institutions by destroying the education which grows out of the family relation. I do not say this to excuse or justify or encourage the want of learning and knowledge. I would encourage it, I would send the light of knowledge and learning and illuminate the mind of every child in this country if I could; but there is a training more important than the training of the school-house, and that is the training of the family, where the character and honor and integrity and honesty of a man are instilled into him. Therefore, in going forward with this (I say it without disrespect) undue haste and zeal, taking the enormous sum of $15,000,000 out of the Treasury of the United States to aid the States, I say that we ought to pause and reflect, for fear we do what I have just indicated and for fear that we do what was intimated by the Senator from Indiana, that in throwing this large amount of money into the States you do not check the effort in those States to develop their own common-school system in their own way.

Why, Mr. President, there is no success in life comparable to the success which results from individual effort, none so enduring, none so satisfactory. I would therefore be very cautious before I would appropriate $15,000,000 and put it with the States, the effect of which I am afraid would be, among others, to induce every man—not every man; perhaps that is extravagant—but a very great many men who are now earnestly struggling to build up their own local institutions to put their hands in their pockets and say, "The General Government is going to educate everybody. What is the use of paying any more taxes for education?" That, I say, is my impression. I may be wrong; I hope I am; but it is worth considering.

Now, sir, there is an institution in my State known as the Claflin University, endowed by a philanthropic gentleman, I believe, of the State of Massachusetts, or perhaps of New York—I forget which—dedicated entirely to colored people, and I observe in the report of the superintendent of education upon that college, which I hold in my hand, he says that a number of the students are sustaining themselves in college by day labor.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator seems to be apprehensive of the injurious effect upon local ambition and self-stimulus of the communities that receive this money. If the distribution of the $15,000,000 should be made, then each school-child in South Carolina would have $5, while the child has $20 in Massachusetts. But the point which I wish to call the Senator's attention to particularly is this, which he now seems approaching: The expenditures of which he is now speaking are in the purest sense, of course, charities; religious charities. I was going to ask him if he thinks that the experience of the last fifteen years in the distribution of the Peabody fund, which is one charity, the proposed distribution of the Slater fund and other charities, amounting in all, as I have heard it stated by the representatives of the religious denominations of the country, to probably at least $50,000,000 put into the South since the close of the war as a result of private or denominational religious charity, has been, on the whole, injurious to that local effort of which he speaks?

Mr. BUTLER. I do not think that answers the point I was making, because that was a private charity and of course limited and fixed.

Mr. BLAIR. Does the Senator think that there is any real distinction between a dollar coming from the national Treasury and applied to the purpose of education, and one coming from individuals residing in the country?

Mr. BUTLER. Of course I do. I think there is a very great difference. As I said a while ago, these charities are limited, the amounts are stated, and all institutions accepting them accept them with a distinct understanding that they are not to be increased. But suppose we take this $15,000,000 and put $1,000,000 of it in South Carolina, and this very institution that I refer to should get $150,000—I do not know whether the scheme of his bill provides for that, but suppose, for the purpose of illustration, it should receive $150,000—does not the Senator know perfectly well that it would paralyze very largely and check the efforts of individuals to keep it up? I want now to read what I think is very commendable:

> Claflin college of agriculture was established in 1872 as a co-ordinate department of the university. A farm of one hundred and fifty acres is cultivated mostly by student labor, under a superintendent. Many students support themselves largely by labor, for which they are paid in cash. This department is supported principally by the income arising from the sale of lands granted by act of Congress for the encouragement of industrial education. The normal school went into operation in 1877.

I beg to say that if you would put at the disposal of that institution $100,000 annually for ten years all the individual effort of that kind which I think so commendable would cease in a large measure. I mention that simply by way of illustration.

Mr. BLAIR. This is confined to the common schools; that is not included.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand that, but the same principle in my judgment would obtain as to the common schools. But we are not so far behind in education in South Carolina. One would suppose from the debate that we were benighted, in the depths of a hopeless despair, on the verge of a savage state, incurably illiterate and ignorant, and beset by a very demon of darkness. Why, Mr. President, I feel rather inclined to boast of the educational institutions of my State. As I said a while ago, we contribute as much as we can contribute in the 2-mill tax upon the assessed value of the property, and I will show after a while that that is increasing and has increased. But there are in my State, in addition, some other institutions of education.

Mr. HOAR. I want at some time in the Senator's remarks to call his attention to the statistics of South Carolina in regard to one subject he has touched upon; that is, the fact that they are doing their full share and more for the colored people. I wish to ask him whether the statistics do not show the necessity of aid? It may be convenient for me to do it now.

Mr. HOAR. To exhibit fully the value of agricultural, manufacturing, and mining products the following tables have been prepared, the values for 1870 having been reduced to the gold standard, at the rate of 120:

FINAL RECAPITULATION.

The whole value of agricultural, manufacturing, and mining products for the last twenty-three years is as follows:

|---|---|
| 1860 | $54,455,707 |

| 1883 | 76,554,725 |

In other words, after all the losses of the war and with free labor, the gross income of South Carolina from the sources named was 50 per cent. greater than it was in 1860.

So, Mr. President, I am not prepared to admit, because I do not believe it is true, that we are in such desperate straits in the South that we can not provide schools with proper effort on our own part (which is being put forth now, I can assure the Senator from New Hampshire, with all the energy and all the zeal possible). I can not believe with that showing, and it is reliable, with the increase of prosperity and wealth of the people in that State and the disposition to remove that illiteracy, but that it will be done in the course of time. It may take five years; it may take ten; but when once removed by our own exertions the benefit is of a far more enduring character than if the result is attained by the benefactions of the Government of the United States. I regret to say in that connection that for one, devoted as I am to the institutions of this country, I can never consent to encourage a disposition all over this land of rushing to the national Treasury to remove every difficulty of a local character. I am unalterably opposed, and in every fair, honorable, and proper way I shall continue to oppose what I believe to be a certain subversion of this Government; this tendency toward converting it into a paternal government instead of preserving it as a government of limited constitutional powers acting in its own sphere within the limits of that Constitution, and leaving the States to regulate their domestic affairs, their own family matters, in their own way, subject to the paramount authority of the Federal Government.

For this particular measure I confess that I can find no authority in the Constitution of the United States. Custom sometimes makes law. A few years ago I introduced a bill upon this floor of a character similar to the one known as the Burnside bill referred to by the Senator from New Hampshire. I had some misgivings at that time as to the constitutional power of Congress to make such appropriations, and I consulted that instrument with an anxious desire to find some express grant of power, and I failed to find it. I searched that instrument with the same anxiety to find some implied power necessary and proper to carry out some express grant on which the measure could rest, and I failed to find it. I fail to find it now. But, as I said, we have fallen into the custom of appropriating money to establish a seed-house and various other institutions of very questionable constitutional authority, and I might have suspended or abated any constitutional scruples I might have had in obedience to that custom which has almost, I am sorry to say, grown into a law of appropriating money for all conceivable and imaginable purposes for which I think we have no constitutional grant; but the policy to be established by this bill is I fear a vicious and dangerous policy, one to which I shall withhold my assent, at least for the present. So, being in doubt as the constitutionality of this measure, I shall solve that doubt in favor of the national Treasury; and as anxious as I am, as sincerely anxious as I am to relieve illiteracy, the consequences of which I think have been exaggerated, I can not give my consent to remove that illiteracy in this form.

My State is in need of money for educational purposes to supplement her own school revenues; no doubt about that. We have had a desperate struggle to confer even the advantages that have been conferred upon the children of that State; but I think the future is brighter for us. I hope so; and for one I desire to put the past, with all its sorrowful memories, behind me. I have no desire in this body or in any other to charge wrong and error and mistake upon my political opponents, although I believe they committed very grave ones and perhaps I am as responsible for that condition of things as the most extreme of them; but for one I would only recur to the past in order to guard against similar mistakes in the future. I therefore with all the lights before me, with my view of the constitutional power of this Government, with my view of the needs and necessities of the South, prefer to—

* * * Bear those ills we have
Than fly to others that we know not of.

My prediction is that if this money is appropriated under this bill—and I beg Senators to mark that prediction—ten years will not roll around before the National Government will have control of every common school in the United States. Perhaps some Senators may think it is better that it should be so. I do not. And as the Senator from Ohio said—not offensively to me, because I do not think he intended it to be offensive—that he could not trust the South to disburse this money owing to our prejudices against the colored people, he will pardon me for saying in the same spirit that I would not trust him to control it.

I will not discuss with that Senator or any other as to whether the prejudice is stronger in the South against the colored people than it is in the North. I do not believe it is. That, however, has nothing to do with this question. But inasmuch as the Senator, I believe, and many of those who are advocating this measure, says he will not trust me to do justice to the negro race with my prejudice, I say to that Senator that I will not trust him to contribute the money for the children in my State. Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes.

I do not say this in any offensive sense. I have no idea that the Senator meant to be offensive. He was, doubtless, perfectly sincere and conscientious about it; but on the whole, as we are getting along pretty well, I believe, as I said, I will solve my constitutional doubt in favor of the Treasury, and I will trust to the pluck, to the endurance, to the manhood, to the courage, to the fortitude, to the humanity of the people of my State to do justice to all her people, white and black, without this aid on the part of the Federal Government.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. JONAS. Will the Senator from California give me one minute before the Senate goes into executive session to call up a resolution received from the House of Representatives to-day which is of imminent importance?

Mr. MILLER, of California. I withdraw the motion.

SUFFERERS FROM MISSISSIPPI OVERFLOW.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHERMAN in the chair). The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS] asks for the present consideration of a House joint resolution.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. Res. 215) reappropriating the sum of $125,000, not expended, for the relief of sufferers by the floods of the Mississippi River

Mr. JONAS. I ask the Secretary to read a letter from the Secretary of War communicated to the House of Representatives in regard to this matter.

Several SENATORS. We have read it.

Mr. MORRILL. Let it be printed.

Mr. JONAS. Very well; there seems to be no opposition to the passage of the resolution, and I shall not ask that the letter be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana withdraws his request.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The PRESIDING OFFICER announced that the President pro tempore had signed the enrolled bill (S. 74) to enable the State of Colorado to take lands in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections found to be mineral lands, and to secure to the State of Colorado the benefit of the act of July 2, 1862, entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," which had previously received the signature of the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-six minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 14 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 26, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted in the following cases:

To Mr. BRAINERD, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. LORE, for four days, on account of important business.

JOHN B. STOCKER.

On motion of Mr. HAMMOND, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of John B. Stocker without leaving copies, there having been no adverse report.

RELIEF OF SUFFERERS BY FLOOD.

Mr. ELLIS. I ask consent to report from the Committee on Appropriations a joint resolution for consideration at this time. I will state, with the permission of the House, that this resolution has been prepared and sent here by the Secretary of War, and does not involve a dollar of additional expense. It simply reappropriates money already appropriated, but not expended, for the relief of certain sufferers.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution, after which there will be opportunity for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 215) reappropriating the sum of $125,000, not expended, for the relief of sufferers by the floods of the Mississippi River.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That so much of the appropriation for the relief of sufferers by the overflow of the Ohio River and its tributaries as remains unexpended, not exceeding the sum of $125,000, may be used by the Secretary of War in the purchase and distribution of subsistence stores and payment for necessary transportation to aid in the relief of destitute persons in the district overflowed by the Mississippi River and its tributaries; and he is authorized to co-operate with the authorities of the several States of which such district is a part in making distribution of supplies.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. RICE. What opportunity will be allowed for discussion?

Mr. KEIFER. I would allow discussion.

Mr. ELLIS. I only wish to know whether any one objects.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman reserves the right to object until he ascertains what opportunity will be allowed for discussion.

Mr. ELLIS. Does my friend desire to discuss it?

Mr. RICE. I desire opportunity for discussion.

Mr. KING. Let him have it.

Mr. ELLIS. If it will suit the gentleman I propose it be discussed for half an hour.

Mr. DUNN. I hope it will include the privilege of offering amendments?

Mr. ELLIS. I will give fifteen minutes to the other side, reserving fifteen minutes to this side.

Mr. DUNN. I desire to know whether opportunity for amendment will be allowed?

Mr. ELLIS. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts accept?

Mr. RICE. I think there should be some time for some members beside myself. I think there should be an hour.

Mr. KEIFER. Make it an hour on each side.

Mr. ELLIS. I will make it an hour to be equally divided. The gentleman from Massachusetts can take half an hour.

Mr. DUNN. If the gentleman from Louisiana will answer a question—I desire to ask him if he will yield for that purpose. Will the Speaker inform me if the gentleman from Louisiana will yield to allow a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Louisiana yield to the gentleman from Arkansas for a question?

Mr. ELLIS. I do, sir.

Mr. DUNN. I desire to know if an opportunity will be given to offer an amendment?

Mr. ELLIS. I am acting as the organ of the committee. This resolution was formulated by the Appropriations Committee; I have no right to make any concessions, to accept any amendments, or do otherwise in reference to the matter than to press the passage of the resolution in its present form.

Mr. DUNN. I do not understand whether the debate agreed to upon this resolution is general debate, or whether it is to be confined to one hour, at the expiration of which time the gentleman from Louisiana will be permitted to take the floor and call the previous question upon it, thereby cutting off all opportunity for amendment.

I will state to the House that I do not think the amount covered by the resolution is large enough, and I want to move to increase it to $300,000.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Louisiana consent to the introduction of an amendment such as that suggested by the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. ELLIS. I am not authorized to accept any amendment, or to agree to anything other than what I have suggested.

Mr. DUNN. I do not ask the gentleman to accept the amendment, but to permit the House to vote upon it; that is all.

Mr. ELLIS. I am not authorized to make any concession on the part of the committee. I am simply obeying instructions.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. RICE. I will not object to the report of the Committee on Appropriations being considered at this time, provided an hour be allowed for the discussion.

Mr. ELLIS. That is conceded.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that to be granted on the part of the committee.

Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

The question is on ordering the resolution to be engrossed and read the third time. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. RICE. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to occupy very many minutes myself upon this question. I feel, however, that this resolution presents again a question which ought to be discussed. I feel that it is the duty of this House to consider calmly and dispassionately for a few moments a question so important as that involved in the resolution now before us.

I know, sir, that it is a most ungracious task to interpose any objection to legislation of this character when it is proposed and claimed on the score of aiding suffering humanity. But, sir, it seems to me that just now is the opportunity for meeting and considering this question of affording local relief to every local calamity and the sufferers thereby. These calls are becoming so frequent, so loud, and so importunate that we ought to stop and consider upon the threshold whether each one deserves the relief it claims, or whether that relief should be extended to any of them at all. Now, what is it that is contemplated by this resolution? It contemplates the distribution of supplies by the National Government to sufferers by a local calamity. What is this calamity? It is a calamity somewhat extensive, it is true, though it is one that has been expected for weeks, or might have been. It is not in its general details and in its magnitude very much in excess of calamities which have preceded it from the same cause, and which may be expected to follow.

Mr. KING. My friend is very much mistaken.

Mr. RICE. It is not a calamity beyond the capacity of the local authorities, as it seems to me, to deal with; and it is not a calamity which, according to my idea, comes within the sphere of our power under a just construction of the rights granted to or the duties imposed upon the Federal Government. The distribution of supplies. That is what it is. Now, this is not an inclement season of the year. There is no scarcity of provisions in the country; and in my opinion if the mere distribution of supplies, the providing of shelter and food be what is required, the municipal authorities where the sufferers reside are sufficiently able to perform all that is demanded, and are the ones upon whom the duty devolves.

Mr. Speaker, these calls are becoming too frequent. Let a disease break out among the cattle of Kansas, and the representatives of that State call upon the National Government for an immediate appropriation to protect their stock and defend the rest of the State from the spread of the disease. Very soon if there be a fire devastating any one of our cities, or any considerable section of one of our States, what is there to prevent the sufferers from that calamity from coming to this body and asking for relief? Does this Government act as an insurer against fire? Has it any right to pay for the house or the block of buildings of citizens of Chicago when it is consumed by that element, or of the citizen of Boston when his property falls a prey to that destroyer?

If not of fire, how then of water? Has this Government any right, has even the State government any right, to insure the man who dwells under the shadow of the levees along the banks of the great river against the destruction of his property by the flood that is liable to sweep over it? I deny it. Not even the State or municipal governments have that right, much less the national.

This, then, is simply a question of supplies, of food and shelter to those who have been anticipating this calamity for weeks and upon whom it is about to fall. Food and shelter. And is it for the National Government to furnish these? Is it not for the local and municipal authorities? I was never prouder of the city of Boston, of which I have had occasion to say hard things sometimes, than when she, with a great proportion of her wealth in ashes, refused to accept State aid or even the aid of private charity, but said, "We will rebuild ourselves what has been destroyed within our municipal limits."

It is by self-reliance that strength comes, and it is by this continual coddling and nursing that weakness and degeneracy are created. Let the great States along the bank of the river provide shelter and food in this pleasant season of the year for those who need it. Let private charity replace the crumbled buildings, restore the farms, provide seed for the crops. That only can do it. But let this great National Government remember that which is best for the localities of this great nation, that they shall protect and rely upon themselves, and here put down its foot upon these importunate clamors ever rising higher and louder for aid against local calamities.

I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] five minutes.

Mr. DUNN. I will offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk for information and shall ask the adoption of it if it shall be in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out "$125,000" and inserting "$300,000."

The SPEAKER. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas is read simply for information as part of his remarks.

Mr. DUNN. I desire to state to the House that I am convinced now, as I was more than two weeks ago, that such an appropriation as this ought to be made. The Secretary of War ought to have been supplied with additional and ample means to follow that great flood from the Ohio River to the sea. It swept over a region of 25,000,000 acres of land in its course to the sea and has driven or will drive more than 300,000, probably 400,000, people from their homes. That flood is not yet ended. Had there been no flood but that which passed at that time from the Ohio River, which was phenomenal in its character, those people might have lived through it and have been able to reorganize and make a crop. But that great flood has been re-enforced and is being re-enforced by additional floods now coming down the Ohio River and its tributaries and the upper Mississippi and the Missouri.

As I said before in this House, I know that that water will continue sixty days longer. It will sweep away the last chance that those people, the laboring people there, have for procuring supplies and provisions. These are plantation laborers, colored people, who are dependent upon their employers and upon the country merchants to advance supplies to them on the faith and prospect of being able to make a crop for the ensuing year. This addition to the waters makes that so doubtful that neither merchants nor employers will advance provisions to them, but will say to them, "Now that these waters are re-enforced and will continue yet for sixty days, making it uncertain whether you can produce a crop or not, we can not feed you longer." They have fed them the last thirty days.

There has been suffering and there has been destitution. That has been brought to the attention of the War Department. It has been brought to the attention of the Committee on Appropriations. But what I have complained of heretofore is that the committee has overlooked that condition of things. The people of Arkansas and Mississippi, more than a hundred thousand of them, have been driven from their homes; hundreds of them have been rendered destitute and have found themselves helpless. They have appealed to the governor of my State, who has found himself without an appropriation to relieve them, and there is no Legislature in session, and he has referred their complaints here. They have not, it is true, been in great numbers, but that was because of the appearance that the waters would subside early. When I brought the matter to the attention of the Secretary of War he stated that the waters appeared to be subsiding and he thought that the interposition of the Government would not be necessary. All that appearance has been swept away. What I have excepted to here was the tenor of his letter. He says that the water below Vicksburg is within a few inches of high-water mark. But, sir, for thirty days past it has been up to the high-water mark, the highest water mark in both Arkansas and Mississippi. The same conditions have existed there that are now reported in Louisiana. There is no difference; and this aid ought to be extended in amount sufficient to relieve all.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RICE] yield?

Mr. RICE. If any gentleman desires to speak in opposition I will yield to him. If not, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has ten minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. RICE. Then I reserve that time for the present.

Mr. ELLIS. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. JEFFORDS].

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, the present flood in the Mississippi River is one that is most unusual in its character. Never in the history of the floods of that river has it been known that the water has risen to such a height from the mere local rains. The great flood which swept the Ohio Valley so recently has not caused the flood now in the lower Mississippi River, but it is entirely from the local rains; and from Vicksburg down the flood is higher by several inches than it was in 1882.

The prospect is that the ice in the upper Mississippi and in the Missouri River when it breaks up will free the floods of water, which will then come down from those streams, and the consequence will be that the extent of the calamity which will be visited upon this locality has not yet been reached. In my opinion the amount named in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] ought to be increased. It may be that when the time shall come the House will be equal to the emergency; but I am satisfied that even $300,000, the amount named in that amendment, will not be sufficient to relieve the suffering caused by these floods.

The sufferers to be relieved are the poor people, the laboring people, who have no provisions, and according to information are to-day in an absolutely starving and suffering condition. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RICE] has said that the local authorities should take care of the needy among their own people. Sir, the local authorities are not now in a condition to act with sufficient promptness. Present, immediate help is needed. The people of this vast region of country, of whole parishes in Louisiana and whole counties in Mississippi, are suffering from the entire submergence of their lands, and no local authority can reach their cases.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RICE] says that the season is not an inclement one. If that gentleman had to live in the loft of a gin-house, or to seek the levees and live in the open air with the rains dashing upon him during the cold nights, he would think the season was rather inclement. Two years ago I knew one spot, a little mound not larger than the area of this hall, where one hundred and fifty people camped for sixty days; they were not within thirty miles of dry land anywhere. Yet they had to subsist in the open air, to live in boats, and on that little mound exposed to the inclemency of the weather. That is the condition to-day in these parishes and counties of Louisiana and Mississippi that are submerged.

Shall this great nation, which has always been so liberal and generous, not only toward its own people but toward the people of other countries—shall this Congress of the United States hesitate to grant relief in the presence of such a calamity as this? I trust that without any hesitation, with promptness, this joint resolution will be immediately passed, and, if amendable, that it will be amended so that it will appropriate at least $300,000.

Let me say to the House that in my opinion when the floods now on their way from the upper Mississippi and the Missouri shall reach the lower Mississippi the height of the flood of 1882 will be far exceeded, and there will be such suffering and such calamity as never before have visited any people or any nation. These people now want instant relief. Information comes from every quarter in the submerged region that the people are starving and suffering from cold and the inclemency of the weather.

It does not follow that because that is a warmer climate than this the weather there can not be inclement. We have there inhospitable days and nights. Every resident in that section of the country knows that there is nothing in the South so pinching as a cold, damp night, when there is a chilliness in the atmosphere which almost pierces the very marrow in their bones.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ELLIS. I yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER], my colleague on the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. KEIFER. I am in favor of the passage of this joint resolution, but not of the amendment which has been indicated by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN], because it does not yet sufficiently appear by anything which has been brought to my attention that such an amendment is necessary. I will state to the gentleman that if the time shall come when it shall seem to be necessary to make a further appropriation to these people, I shall be found voting in favor of it.

It is well enough to understand the scope of the joint resolution now reported from the Committee on Appropriations. It does not provide for any additional appropriation of money; it simply extends the benefit of a prior appropriation to a class of people who are circumstanced as were the people along the Ohio River and its tributaries for whom the original appropriation was made.

The Secretary of War reports to us that over $125,000 remains unexpended of the $500,000 appropriated by this Congress for the purpose of granting relief to the sufferers from the floods of the Ohio River and its tributaries. And if such an amount is still unexpended, I can see no reason why we may not extend the scope of that bounty to people similarly situated to those along the Ohio River and its tributaries.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. If the money already appropriated is not applied to the sufferers by the flood on the Ohio River and its tributaries, will it not be returned to the national Treasury, unless otherwise directed by Congress? And is there in fact any difference between the reappropriation of that money and an original appropriation of money?

Mr. KEIFER. I am obliged to the gentleman for asking the question. I can say with knowledge that this money, if not otherwise disposed of, may be appropriated for the relief of people who are sufferers by the flood of the Ohio River and its tributaries. There are a great many people who have suffered by that flood; it is simply a question of degree of suffering. The Secretary of War has the power to apply the money already appropriated for the relief of the sufferers along the Ohio River and its tributaries, and whether he shall extend it further than he has already done is a matter in his discretion, for there are very many thousands there who are sufferers to a certain degree.

In order to answer the question of the gentleman directly, I may say that by the terms of the appropriation already made the Secretary of War is required to expend this money, and if he executes that joint resolution for the alleviation of the sufferers along the Ohio River and its tributaries he may expend the whole amount of the original appropriation for that purpose.

Mr. HISCOCK. Does the gentleman claim that the Secretary of War will expend the money, if it be unnecessary, under the terms of the appropriation?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly not, and if the gentleman had listened he would have understood that the information in the possession of the Secretary of War, the Committee on Appropriations, and others is that a large number of the people for whom that appropriation was made are still in a great degree destitute; but it is a question whether we shall go to the utmost and relieve all these people, or whether we shall take $125,000 of this money and use it for the relief of people who are suffering still more, who are in such distress that unless relief be extended they must soon starve. As I said in the beginning this is a question of degree.

It is now too late to undertake to raise a question as to the constitutionality of the appropriation which we have already made. It is a little late, too, in the history of this country to undertake to raise that question.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I did not raise it.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman from Illinois did not raise it; but the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RICE] spoke of it. The General Government has throughout its history selected extraordinary cases for granting relief. Where we shall stop, where the boundary line is, must always rest within the discretion of Congress. The Constitution of the United States in its preamble recites that the instrument is ordained for the purpose, among other objects, of "promoting the general welfare" of the people of this country. It is a part of our duty to extend relief in this way in extraordinary cases, whether the distress comes from flood or fire or other calamity.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KEIFER. I would like two or three minutes more, if the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] has the time to spare.

Mr. ELLIS. I yield to the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. KEIFER. I simply wish to say, by way of re-enforcing my last remark, that there is nothing we can do that will tend more to "promote the general welfare" than to meet just such emergencies as these when they arise—whether they come from fires in Boston or Chicago or from extraordinary floods along the great rivers of the country. To afford relief in cases of this kind is one of the highest duties of the Congress of the United States, the exercise of which should commend it to a liberal and charitable people.

I am in favor of making this reappropriation, or rather of extending the powers of the Secretary of War under the appropriation already made, so that he may, as the resolution states, in his discretion relieve people along the Mississippi River and its tributaries, who are suffering more than those along the Ohio River and its tributaries.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ELLIS. I yield five minutes to my colleague [Mr. LEWIS].

Mr. LEWIS. I yield three minutes to my colleague [Mr. HUNT].

Mr. HUNT. Mr. Speaker, if I could have the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RICE] for one moment I would ask him to consider that this appropriation is plainly warranted by the terms of the Constitution. That instrument provides that—> Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

The constitutional power thus lodged in Congress was necessarily adequate and complete, else the feeble and decaying Confederation would never have been supplanted, and the succeeding Government of the United States with proper powers erected in its stead. Commenting upon the provision of the Constitution which I have just read, another citizen of Massachusetts, Justice Story, takes a different view from that of the gentleman. Referring to the provision in question Judge Story says (and as I understand) by way of sustaining what he considered the power of the Government and the true doctrine:

> In the history of mankind it has ordinarily been found that in the usual progress of things the necessities of a nation in every stage of its existence are at least equal to its resources. * * * It is impossible to foresee all the various changes in the posture, relations, and power of different nations which might affect the prosperity and safety of our own. We may have formidable foreign enemies; we may have internal commotions; we may suffer from physical as well as moral calamities, from plagues, famine, and earthquakes; from political convulsions and rivalries; from the gradual decline of particular sources of industry; and from the necessity of changing our own habits and pursuits in consequence of foreign improvements and competition and the variable nature of human wants and desires.

Now, then, if the power to lay and collect taxes, &c., be unlimited except as laid down in the Constitution, the terms of the instrument immediately following, and providing that the taxes referred to are "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare," are a qualification or restraint upon the taxing power itself. That is to say, the power to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States is not in the common sense a general, distinct, or substantial power. In other words, the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises is given in order to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare.

Justice Story proceeds in the just and free spirit in which he has commented on other portions of the Constitution to observe:

> It is said if Congress may lay taxes for the common defense and general welfare, the money may be appropriated for those purposes, although not within the scope of the other enumerated powers. Certainly it may be so appropriated; for if Congress is authorized to lay taxes for such purposes it would be strange if when raised the money could not be applied to them. That would be to give a power to a certain end and then deny the end intended by the power.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, I have no disposition whatever to discuss the constitutional phases of this question. It is sufficient to state in this connection that in the history of this Government a great many precedents have been established whereby such an appropriation as is now asked from this body can be and in my judgment ought to be justified in the mind of every member of this House. I rose merely to say a single word in answer to some remarks which fell from the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RICE], in which he seemed to cast reproach upon our demand for aid in this matter because the sufferers by the conflagrations in the city of Chicago and the city of Boston were not relieved by appropriations from Congress.

I wish to call to his attention the fact that the conflagration in Chicago took place on the 9th of October, 1871, at a time when Congress was not in session, and no relief could be given; and that the conflagration in the city of Boston took place on the 9th of November, the following year, a time also when no relief could be given by this body. It was, moreover, publicly announced at the time that the citizens of Boston did not desire aid. I only care to say in addition that if I had been in this body at that time and any demand had come to me as a member thereof for my action in their behalf I would, as was on a somewhat similar occasion said by Mr. Crittenden, cheerfully have laid down the Constitution at the feet of mercy, and voted to make any appropriation necessity called for in these conflagrations.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to have read a dispatch from Governor McEnery showing the necessity for this appropriation.

The Clerk read as follows:

> BATON ROUGE, LA., March 24, 1884.
> General E. T. LEWIS:
> Morganza, Scott, Waterloo levees gone; ten parishes, most of your district, under water. The laboring population will suffer considerably. The State is in no condition to minister to their wants. Urge upon Secretary of War for rations for the laboring people, who are surrounded by water and in a few days will be starving. Have rations in same quantities as in 1882. Let there be no delay.

Mr. ELLIS. I yield for two minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BARKSDALE].

Mr. BARKSDALE. Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago intelligence was received here that the dwellers along the banks of the Ohio River were suffering greatly from the overflow of that stream. They were houseless and homeless, and appeal was made to this body to furnish assistance to the sufferers. Without dissent, by a vote approximating unanimity, an appropriation of $500,000 was made for their relief.

Now, sir, the people who dwell along the banks of the Mississippi River are suffering in the same way; no more I will say, but certainly no less. There is $125,000 left of the money which was appropriated for the relief of the Ohio Valley sufferers. Appeal is now made to the House upon the recommendation of the Secretary of War to appropriate the unexpended balance of the $500,000, namely, $125,000, for the relief of the sufferers along the banks of the Lower Mississippi. I ask gentlemen on both sides of the House whether they are not willing to grant by their votes this poor pittance? Are they not willing to do this act of justice? I am sure the appeal is not in vain.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I ask the gentleman from Louisiana to yield to me for half a minute.

Mr. ELLIS. I shall reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Will not the gentleman from Louisiana yield to me for thirty seconds?

Mr. ELLIS. With pleasure.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. A few days ago, Mr. Speaker, the House, with a unanimity of which I was proud, appropriated half a million dollars for the sufferers along the valley of the Ohio River, affecting my constituents as well as those of other gentlemen. That was unchallenged almost by gentlemen on both sides of the House. I think it would be ungrateful on our part if we refuse to vote this relief. I hope it will pass at once.

Mr. ELLIS. I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has ten minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RICE] has ten minutes.

Mr. RICE. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH].

Mr. BEACH. Mr. Speaker, Congress, in my judgment, misappropriated the public funds when it gave $500,000 for the relief of the Ohio flood sufferers, and yet, under that previous action on the part of the House, it might very properly be maintained that the Ohio sufferers acquired vested rights in that money; that they were the beneficiaries of the fund. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] now asks that the fund be further diverted and devoted to the benefit of the sufferers of the Mississippi Valley. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] then comes in and asks that the appropriation be increased so as to provide relief for the people of his State.

I am opposed, Mr. Speaker, to all of these appropriations. It is unfair—I will not say it is unconstitutional, because there is so little respect for the Constitution on this floor that the argument would be of no avail—but it is unfair and unjust.

Mr. DUNN. The gentleman will allow me to correct him. Under the provisions of this resolution the Secretary of War will be empowered to give relief to all sufferers by overflow of the Mississippi River in Arkansas and elsewhere. My apprehension was, from the insufficiency of the appropriation and because the Secretary of War in his letter indicated he thought the only suffering was below Vicksburg, it did not include all persons rendered destitute by this overflow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BEACH. I hope I will have a minute longer, as the gentleman from Arkansas has taken up all my time.

Mr. RICE. Certainly.

Mr. BEACH. I will not stop to answer the question of the gentleman from Arkansas, as it will deprive me of the opportunity of saying the few words I desire to say.

Mr. Speaker, when I was interrupted I was saying that it is unfair and unjust. There is a law that is higher than the Constitution. It is a law that is founded in the old maxim that where there is equality of burden there should be equality of benefit. And judged by this maxim, it is unfair and unjust to take the money that is contributed by public burdens and apply it to the benefit of people of any particular section of country. I am opposed to this resolution and to all resolutions of a similar character, and now I give notice that when this resolution is on its passage I shall demand the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. BUDD. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BUDD. I wish to ask whether an amendment to the pending resolution is now in order.

The SPEAKER. It is not. The House is engaged in general debate on the proposition under an arrangement made by unanimous consent that there should be debate for one hour; one-half accorded to those who are opposed to the resolution and one-half to those who are in favor of it.

Mr. BUDD. Will it be in order at the expiration of the hour to offer an amendment?

The SPEAKER. It will be, unless the previous question shall be ordered.

Mr. BUDD. Then I give notice at this time that I desire to offer an amendment to this resolution.

Mr. RICE. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS].

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I do not choose to raise the constitutional question. The only question that should interest us is the question of public policy; and I desire to say that no appropriation should be made out of the national Treasury except to relieve distress occasioned by an unforeseen catastrophe, and then only so far as it is absolutely necessary to go for that purpose. Therefore we ought to consider, first, whether the inhabitants of those States that are now threatened with disaster can not provide by special session of their Legislatures for the larger part of the relief which they ask from us; and secondly, that we ought not to provide for the injuries that are likely to accrue from the annual floods of the upper Missouri and upper Mississippi Rivers, since that is a catastrophe which can not be called unforeseen. All that we ought to do is to prevent the starvation which will follow if we do not interpose governmental aid.

Mr. RICE. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM].

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for this appropriation with the information that I have at present, but I should like, inasmuch as gentlemen on the other side of the House have constantly contended that the national Congress has no right to make any law or to do anything unless it is specially granted to it by the Constitution, to ask them to answer me a question bearing upon that subject. Now then, more as a matter of information than of opposition to this measure, I would like my friend from Texas, Judge REAGAN, who seems to be so well posted, to point out to me under what particular clause of the Constitution they contend that we have the right to grant this appropriation? Or I ask any other gentleman on that side to give me the information.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me to answer the question?

Mr. BRUMM. Yes, sir.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I will say to the gentleman that the members of this side of the House gave an explanation of their opinion on that question by voting almost unanimously in favor of appropriating $500,000 for the relief of the sufferers from the overflow in the Ohio River.

Mr. BRUMM. The gentleman misapprehends my question. I do not ask him to point out a specific case where this relief has been granted, but to point me to the clause, the specific clause, of the Constitution which warrants it in the opinion of gentlemen on that side of the House.

The SPEAKER. The time allowed to the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

The gentleman from Massachusetts has three minutes remaining.

Mr. RICE. Mr. Speaker, I have never desired unnecessarily to occupy a moment of the time of this House. I made my point in opposition to this resolution in the few moments during which I occupied the floor at the commencement of this discussion.

I wish now, in the few moments remaining, to say only this in reply to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER]: that I am too old a member of this House ever to seek to make a constitutional argument against any measure which any member may desire to carry through the House. I know from my experience here that I might just as well seek to dam up this flood in the Mississippi with a paper dam as to keep members out of an overflowing Treasury when they want to get there by any constitutional scruples or by any constitutional arguments, or to keep the men upon whose lips constantly dwell the doctrines of State rights from that Federal Treasury whenever they want to feed out of its surplus themselves or their constituents.

I have made, as I have said, my point; and I desire to take no further time. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] asked me to allow him a few moments of the time remaining, which I will give him, although he is not in opposition to the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas has one minute remaining.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, I asked this remaining time of one minute in order to offer an amendment framed in language that in my judgment will be more apt to accomplish the results desired to be accomplished than the resolution of the Committee on Appropriations which is now pending. But the Chair has just ruled that at this stage of the proceedings an amendment would be out of order, and the gentleman from Louisiana has indicated that at the end of the hour he will feel it to be his duty under the orders of his committee to move the previous question.

Now, unless he should find himself justified in receding from that position, I will avail of this one moment to say that I hope the House will vote down the previous question, in order that I may offer this amendment. Add to the resolution the following words:

And also that the further sum of $175,000 be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the same purpose.

I hope the House will vote down the previous question, in order that I may offer that amendment, and when it is adopted that we shall appropriate the entire sum of $300,000. I know that amount will be needed.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] has ten minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. ELLIS. In answer to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN], I will say it is for the House to determine as to ordering the previous question or not. As the organ of the Committee on Appropriations it is my duty to move the previous question. If the House chooses to vote down the previous question and open the door for amendments, that is the business of the House.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. ELLIS. Certainly.

Mr. DUNN. Does the gentleman not think $300,000 will be needed?

Mr. ELLIS. I think so, and probably double that sum.

Mr. HORR. And I will ask the gentleman from Louisiana further, is there any disposition on the part of the committee, when there is evidence it is needed, to withhold it?

Mr. ELLIS. None in the world, I think.

Mr. Speaker, in making these appropriations, extraconstitutional as they may be, which I doubt, Congress ought to be guided simply by this rule: Wherever the calamity is so widespread, so far-reaching in its effect as to baffle the aid of the local authorities, then the Federal Government should step in and assist.

Now, sir, what is the condition in the overflowed district? There is a region of country to-day overflowed by the Mississippi River and its tributaries larger than all of New England. And it is not a desert, sir; not a depopulated region, but one that is thickly settled. It is almost a dead level. This overflow does not come like the overflow of the Ohio River, where from precipitous hills the waters rush down and fill up the river and make the overflow. The river rises gradually, overflowing its banks, seeking first the bayous and lagoons and low places that lie out and about the homes of these people, until before they know it the insidious waters have crept up about them, and it is water in front and water in rear and water encroaching upon them everywhere. And to-day there are points on the Mississippi River where it is eighty-five miles wide. To-day, by the breaking of one levee, ten parishes as large as the State of Rhode Island are overflowed, populated for the most part by a people the most helpless, the most improvident, and the poorest that claim the citizenship of the Republic. I mean the colored people.

The Legislatures are not in session. This calamity is so widespread, affecting the entire region along the banks of the Mississippi River and its tributaries, that the local authorities are taxed to the utmost in preserving themselves and their own homes, and there is no relief but in the strong, organized relief tendered by the Federal Government.

But, sir, some gentlemen have found constitutional scruples. All agree to it upon the score of mercy; but there are constitutional objections. I can not stop, Mr. Speaker, to answer these now, but I will recur to the history of this country in the time of our forefathers and will show these gentlemen precedents for this action on the part of the House.

In 1812, while we were involved in a great contest, in a war with Great Britain on land and sea which was calling for the exertion of all our vigor and resources, intelligence reached this country of a great calamity in South America. There occurred in Venezuela an earthquake which had toppled over the houses and opened great chasms in the streets of Caracas, destroying that city and plunging its population into mourning and want. Although we were involved in war, Nathaniel Macon, then chairman of the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures—Nathaniel Macon, of North Carolina, called in his biography "the stringent and severe Democrat, the strict constructionist"—moved the following resolution. I may state at the same time intelligence had reached the United States that the Island of Teneriffe, one of the Canaries, had been visited by swarms of locusts that had eaten up the crops and substance of the people and left them in a state of destitution. Mr. Nathaniel Macon moved the following resolution:

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to report a bill authorizing the President of the United States to cause to be purchased —— barrels of flour, and to have the same exported to such port in Caracas for the use of the inhabitants who have suffered by the earthquake; and also authorizing him to purchase —— barrels of flour, and to have the same exported to some port in Teneriffe for the use of the inhabitants who are likely to starve by the ravages of locusts.

The amount originally contemplated was $30,000. Who moved the amendment to increase the amount to $50,000? John C. Calhoun, of South Carolina, moved that the amount be increased to $50,000; and the resolution passed, passed unanimously, passed nem. con. Of the honored roll of statesmen who have illustrated the glorious annals of this country the names of the following are found as voting for it in the affirmative: James Breckinridge, of Virginia; John C. Calhoun, of South Carolina; Langdon Cheves, of the same State; Felix Grundy, of Tennessee; Richard M. Johnson, of Kentucky; William R. King, of Alabama; Nathaniel Macon, of North Carolina; Israel Pickens, of North Carolina; John Randolph, of Virginia; and George M. Troup, of Georgia.

But again, sir, in 1847 intelligence of a great calamity reached the United States from Ireland. Again we were at war. Mr. Speaker, it would seem that to emphasize these splendid exhibitions of mercy they came at a time when the nation was engaged in war. These magnificent sunbursts of mercy breaking through the rift of the war-cloud and shining upon the rain of blood and tears, painted upon the cloud of war the bow of hope and promise that a nation was born among the nations of the earth in whose great heart beat the love and affection and universal brotherhood of man. We were at war. Mr. Crittenden, of Kentucky introduced the following bill:

A bill to provide some relief for the suffering people of Ireland and Scotland.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized to cause to be purchased such provisions as he may deem suitable and proper, and to cause the same to be transported and tendered in the name of the Government of the United States to that of Great Britain for the relief of the people of Ireland and Scotland suffering from the great calamity of scarcity and famine.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That the sum of $500,000 be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry into effect this act.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized, at his discretion, to use the public ships of the United States for the transportation of the provisions to be purchased as aforesaid.

On the passage of that bill, and it passed the Senate by a vote of 27 to 13, I find the following among those voting in the affirmative: Berrien, Calhoun, Cameron, Cass, Clayton, Corwin, Crittenden, Davis, Dayton, Evans, Houston, Reverdy Johnson, Mangum, Moorehead, Soulé, and Webster.

Talk about constitutional doubts! Why, sir, who approved the joint resolution passed in 1812 for the relief of the people of Caracas? There is one man in our history called the "Father of the Constitution." No doubt can arise upon the Constitution which is not settled if James Madison has spoken upon it. Yet this father of the Constitution, James Madison, wielding the sword of the Constitution and the executive power of the country, immediately signed that relief resolution.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ELLIS. I demand the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

Mr. DUNN. I hope that will be voted down so that I may move the amendment I have indicated.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 118, noes 26.

So (no further count being called for) the previous question was ordered.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. ELLIS. And on that I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. BEACH. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution.

The question was taken, and there were 15 in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative not being one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The joint resolution was then passed.

Mr. ELLIS moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. KING. I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD some remarks, together with some telegrams, upon the subject of the joint resolution just passed.

There was no objection, and leave was granted accordingly. [See Appendix.]

STATUE OF JAMES A. GARFIELD.

Mr. KEIFER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6253) to provide for the preparation of a site and the erection of a pedestal for a statue of the late President James A. Garfield; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon the reference of the bill.

Mr. KEIFER moved that the bill be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Is that a proper reference of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that under the rule it should go to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Then let it go there.

Mr. KEIFER. It is purely a matter of appropriation.

The SPEAKER. Is there a law providing for the erection of this statue?

Mr. KEIFER. There is no law providing for the statue, but the bill is in accordance with the custom which has prevailed in the erection of all the statues in the city of Washington.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The bill should go to the Committee on the Library.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the question to the House. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] moves that the bill introduced by him be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 58, noes 51.

So (no further count being called for) the bill was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee on Agriculture for reference to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BREWER, of New Jersey. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees for reports.

The SPEAKER. That requires a two-third vote.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 108, noes 13.

So (no further count being called for) the morning hour was dispensed with (two-thirds voting therefor).

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 74) to enable the State of Colorado to take lands in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections found to be mineral lands, and to secure to the State of Colorado the benefit of the act of July 2, 1862, entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts."

DR. B. J. D. IRWIN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the petition of Surg. B. J. D. Irwin, United States Army, for compensation for personal property destroyed by fire during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MANZANARES, for eighteen days, on account of sickness in his family.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to proceed with the consideration of revenue bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. DORSHEIMER in the chair.

BONDED-WHISKY BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole, and resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5265) to extend the time for the payment of the tax on distilled spirits now in warehouse. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PUSEY] five minutes of my time.

Mr. PUSEY. I have sat here for three days without any intention whatever to participate in this debate. My people are not particularly interested in this question. We have in Iowa prohibition pure and simple; we do not do anything bad out there.

It is true that we have the biggest distillery in the world within the shadow of the dome of our capitol, but it is simply an arm of our missionary society. We send the product of that distillery as "leaves for the healing of the nations;" we send it to our sister States and Territories. And I have sometimes thought when I saw a gentleman rise on this floor that he had the true spirit of Iowa in him. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to say anything on this question. I have listened to the silvery-tongued orator of Kentucky, the young and impetuous gentleman who argued so passionately for his constituency, and I girded up the loins of my compassion and said, "No." I listened to that other gentleman from Kentucky, the gentleman with the historic name, who presented his claim so fairly——

A MEMBER. You mean Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas.

Mr. PUSEY. I refer to Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky. That name is historic enough for me. I heard him present his claim so fairly, conceding every argument almost that had been presented by the opposition, yet made out so strong a case for his constituency, that when he was through I said, "No." I listened to my learned friend from Connecticut [Mr. EATON], who held up a little paper here and said: "If you will just let me put this proviso on this bill I will vote for it, for then I can say to my constituency in Connecticut that I have driven a hard bargain with these whisky men." "I would make them pay this interest quarterly in advance," says the Senator, which I believe under the laws of Connecticut, Mr. Chairman, is usury. I listened to that argument, and I said, "No." But when I heard my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. POTTER], a gentleman who stands upon this floor accredited with great ability in finance, when I heard him utter yesterday the sentiment which I will ask the Clerk to read, I ran down the aisle and asked to interrupt him, which he refused to permit. I ask the Clerk to read the sentence which I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

If this money is received from the tax on distilled spirits it must inevitably be paid out and undermine and destroy to a certain extent the national banking system upon which rests, more than upon any other present instrumentality, the stability and prosperity of the business of the country.

Mr. PUSEY. Mr. Chairman, I think that sentiment ought not to go abroad to the country unanswered. If it be true, I think this whisky bonded bill will have more friends on this floor than it ever had before. Is it possible, Mr. Chairman, that the permanent prosperity of this nation depends upon the prosperity of any one industry in this country? What are the facts? If this money is paid into the Treasury is it going to stimulate the redemption of Government bonds to such an extent as to produce a panic in this country? What are the facts? Why, sir, I went to the office of the Treasurer of the United States this morning, and I will read to this House the absolute facts of this case as I there learned them.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MCKINLEY. I now propose to yield five minutes to my colleague [Mr. MCCORMICK].

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask that my colleague [Mr. PUSEY] be allowed a few minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] has the time in his control.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask that my colleague be allowed ten minutes, not to be deducted from the time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY].

The CHAIRMAN. That arrangement can be made by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. PUSEY. Mr. Chairman, the facts are that $40,000,000 of the circulation of the national banks of this country has within the last eighteen months been surrendered voluntarily by these institutions by deposit of legal-tender currency and taking up their hypothecated bonds. Why? Because their circulation did not pay. In our Western States, where money is worth 10 and 15 per cent. per annum, they can not afford to have their money in 3 per cent. bonds and pay a tax on their circulation. They have lifted their bonds to this extent, $44,000,000, voluntarily.

Now, what is the state of the facts? We have $340,000,000 of paper circulation which is founded on the hypothecated debt of the nation. What are these securities thus hypothecated?

United States bonds held by the Treasurer of the United States in trust for national banks March 26, 1884.

|---|---|
| To secure circulation: | |
| Currency sixes | $3,488,000 |
| Four and one-half percents | 42,375,500 |
| Four percents | 109,144,600 |
| Three percents | 184,192,550 |
| Total | 339,200,650 |
| To secure bank circulation | 343,384,676 |
| Less legal-tenders deposited with Treasurer | 40,000,000 |
| | 303,384,676 |

I want to say in this connection, gentlemen of the committee, that I consider we have arrived at the true autonomy of national control over the currency question in this country. We are issuing $28,600,000 yearly of silver certificates. We are issuing $28,371,810 in gold certificates, or we can do so if there is a demand for them, for we have the gold coming in yearly from the coinage mints to do it with. We are coining gold at the rate of $2,500,000 monthly, and have nearly $600,000,000 of gold in the country. We are coining silver at the rate of $28,300,000 per annum. I have no fear of any vacuum in our currency circulation by reason of the retirement of the national-bank currency. Here is a matter that is self-adjusting. There is no vacuum, and there can be no vacuum. The retirement of the national-bank currency does not exceed $2,500,000 per month, and we are issuing at the rate of nearly $5,000,000 a month of gold and silver certificates. I say, therefore, that the gentleman from New York has done himself and the country great injustice when on this floor yesterday he gave utterance to that sentiment which has been read from the desk. I did not rise, Mr. Chairman, to discuss the "whisky bonded bill," but simply to correct an error, a fatal error, in which my distinguished friend from New York had fallen. I thank the committee for their courtesy in extending my time.

Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to detain the committee. I do not want to argue this bonded whisky question; but I do think that such utterances from such distinguished men from the great money centers of this country should not go unanswered.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I will now yield fifteen minutes to my colleague [Mr. MCCORMICK].

Mr. MCCORMICK. Mr. Chairman, I am aware that the measure now before the House has been pretty fully discussed pro and con, and my remarks shall be brief. Fair and honorable debate concedes to every man the right to his convictions as also the right to advocate them, and, free from acrimony and bitterness, leads to safest results in the discussion of any measure. I shall content myself with the expression of some convictions of my own, more or less, directly or indirectly, growing out of the matter now before us for our consideration.

The question involved in this discussion on the proposition now before the House in the provisions of this bill seems to me to be one of policy against principle, of expediency against right. Policy asks what is easiest, what will pay best? while principle asks the question, What is right? and knowing the right, performs it.

When it comes to a matter of principle, whether you apply the rule to the nation or the individual citizen, its force is the same, and honor and integrity make it binding upon us to observe it.

What ought to be done in regard to the liquor traffic is to members of this House in their official capacity a question of momentous importance. It is a question not to be dealt with rashly, or decided hastily, or without regard for the rights of the citizen; and by the citizen we mean the great body of our people of all classes and conditions in life. Statistics give the whole cost of liquors in the year 1873 at $700,000,000. A recent statement in an editorial of the New York Tribune gives the amount of $800,000,000 spent in this country yearly for drink; an amount exceeding by $100,000,000 the entire sum raised by taxes of all kinds, national, State, county, city, town, and school district, as stated upon the authority of the Census Bureau. America pays whisky dealers more than she pays the laboring classes. Drink costs more than three times as much as we pay for clothes, fourteen times as much as we pay for public schools, and eighteen times as much as we give to the poor.

A traffic that costs in actual payment and in loss of productive labor more than half the national debt every year is not an insignificant matter to the true political economist, leaving out of the question the class who oppose the traffic from moral convictions. The cost of pauperism, of crime from intemperance, the waste of grain, and loss of productive industry in their effects upon the country can not be evaded by the loyal statesman who has his country's good in view and seeks the perpetuity of our free institutions. Such a drain as these make on a nation's resources affords grounds for alarm that can not fail to claim his thoughtful consideration, and against which he fails in duty if he does not lift a warning voice. But there is another phase of this question that necessarily presents itself for our contemplation; other things besides the pecuniary affairs of the nation affect its welfare.

Secretary Seward in his lifetime said:

> No republican government can stand that has not for its support the morality and virtue of the people.

In the same connection he goes on to say:

> But what a fearful decay of public virtue attends the liquor traffic, degrading and destroying to those who should become the pillars and strength of our Government.

It has been well said that "government emanates from the moral attributes of mankind. It is a thing of moral necessity, and its power and obligation are of a moral kind." It is the duty of the Government to make it difficult to do wrong and easy to do right, to throw around the citizen such safeguards and such wholesome protection as will secure him against the impure and vicious and stimulate within him the desire for the pure and the good. But the effect of the liquor traffic, direct and indirect, view it as he may, upon the individual and upon society, is paralyzing to the physical, intellectual, social, moral, and political well-being of the community and State.

Burke has defined law as beneficence acting by rule; but who, in looking at the immeasurable evils, can plead in behalf of the beneficence of the liquor traffic? The thousand of millions of revenue to the Government would soon fly upward in the balance as weighed against the burdens and griefs and anguish and death it entails upon society.

In its hold upon the country this traffic is aggressive in its character and is becoming more and more exorbitant in its demands. In illustration of the truth that

> He that hath a thousand friends hath not a friend to spare,
> But he that hath one enemy shall meet him everywhere, this traffic comes crowding in upon us here. What other business or traffic comes into the council chambers of this nation seeking such help and such special privileges as are demanded by this bill? By what right or precedent does it come here seeking to be freed from its obligations, when no other business would for a moment indulge the thought even that it had any right to make such a claim? But this traffic, in all its boldness and effrontery, according to its accustomed habit of seeking to dictate and control the policy of States, does so assert itself and presents its claims for recognition here. The question that confronts us, then, is this: Is it right that this bill pass? Looking at that question in the length and breadth and full scope of its pecuniary significance, is it for the welfare of our citizens, the comfort of our free homes, and the prosperity of our country? Can we honestly, sincerely, and conscientiously answer that question in the affirmative by our votes in favor of this bill? Are we to give this commerce of death a stronger hold upon us, or is it not a wiser, safer, truer, nobler policy to seek rather to loosen its hold on the vitals of this nation than to suffer it to bind us more strongly in its fatal coils?

Mr. MCKINLEY. I will yield for ten minutes to my colleague, Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, the bill now under consideration is certainly a very peculiar one. It professes to be a revenue bill. That is the title of it, and when the gentlemen in charge of the bill move to go into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of this bill, they always add "for the purpose of considering revenue bills." And this bill does not increase or decrease in any wise the United States revenue. The present rate of taxation on distilled spirits is 90 cents per gallon, and this bill does not propose to change it. It proposes to give an extension of time to the tax-payers, for which they in turn are supposed to pay an adequate compensation. Hence the Government is not to be benefited on the one hand or injured on the other. Then why this legislation? Why is the time of this Congress consumed from day to day in the consideration of a bill in which the Government has no interest whatever?

There is but one answer, and that is, that this legislation is for the benefit of the manufacturers of distilled spirits. They and they alone are to be benefited. The time of the American Congress is being wasted and the money of the American people is being squandered in this remarkable effort to legislate in the interest of a special class. There are on every hand important measures demanding the time and attention of this Congress. There are a thousand bills before this House demanding immediate consideration. Hence for one I shall be glad to have this discussion come to a close and to have the vote taken.

The distinguished gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] made on yesterday a very elaborate argument to convince the House that this bill does not propose to make "a loan" to the distillers of whisky. I was amused at the ingenuity of his argument, but I could not see on the whole that it makes much difference whether it be a loan or an extension of the time in which the parties interested are to pay a debt. True, it has the appearance of a loan; the bill relates to money, and to money due the Government at a fixed time, to a sum certain in each case, and extends the same for a given period on certain specific conditions for a certain rate of interest. This, as I remember the text-books, comes very near the description of a loan. It is a loan to all appearances, and yet it is not a loan. I agree with the gentleman from Connecticut that it is not a loan. It is not intended to be a loan. It is a gift, and is intended to be a gift, a donation, a surrender on the part of the Government of more than $50,000,000.

The gentleman says that this can not be, as the tax is payable at all events, and that the payment is secured by bond. Admit it, and the fact remains the same. Grant this extension, and at the expiration of two years, if the internal-revenue laws are not sooner repealed, you will be asked and expected to grant another extension. It is confidently expected, and this bill means nothing more nor nothing less, that this or the next extension, as the case may be, shall reach beyond the repeal of the internal-revenue tax on whisky. If it were not for this expectation this bill would not be before this House. And when the internal-revenue tax is once removed this debt of fifty and more millions of dollars is canceled. You say, Oh, no; that the Government will have its bonds with security for every dollar of this money. What are bonds worth in a case like this? Gather together all the bonds in the country, trustee bonds, executors' bonds, administrators' bonds, official bonds, and attempt to make forced collections upon them, and what are they worth? Not 50 cents on the dollar on an average.

When the Government is forced to collect its money by litigation it rarely succeeds. It sometimes gets something by compromise, but more frequently fails altogether. In this case it would be driven to litigation, and we all know the result of the recent attempts on the part of the Government to make good the defalcations of its trusted officers. The gentlemen on the other side are not agreed among themselves as to whether the Government under this bill will retain a lien on the whisky in bond. One says it will and another says it will not. But admit that it will. Who will take the whisky out of bond and pay 90 cents a gallon tax on it when he can make it and put it on the market when the internal-revenue laws are repealed for 30 cents a gallon? Suppose some distiller has 10,000,000 gallons of whisky in bond when the tax is removed; will he pay $9,000,000 tax on it to get it out of bond when he can make the whisky and put it on the market for three or four million dollars? Certainly not. Could he not in two years put his property out of his hands if he so desires? Are we sure that in all cases the collector would get good bonds in the first instance? If they were good when taken, what assurance have we that they will be good in two years thereafter?

Look at the monstrous temptation the Government proposes to place before this people. When the scheme is fully ripe, when the internal tax is removed, when the money is due, which then becomes or seems to be a total loss, you will find when it is too late that this unwise legislation has resulted in an enormous loss to the Government. And this is the very thing that this kind of legislation will invite, and the unwisdom of this legislation will then come up as an argument in favor of the remission of these claims in toto. Mark my words, Mr. Chairman, if this bill becomes a law this money will never be paid. The Government may get some of it. Some men may voluntarily pay. The Government by compromise or by expensive litigation may succeed in collecting part of it, but the great bulk of it will never see the inside of the Treasury.

Some one asks if I have no faith in official bonds. Yes, I have some faith in them, but not much. I have a thousand times more faith in the integrity of the debtor, in the integrity of the custodian of money, than I have in their bonds. I trust the man more than I do his bond, and when he becomes recreant to his word and to his trust I turn to his bond faithless and unbelieving. The money will soon be due, and it belongs to the Government, to the people, and I prefer to trust the United States Treasury with this great sum in preference to the manufacturers of whisky or their bondsmen, and shall record my vote accordingly.

Let us look for a moment at the whisky legislation of this country. In the first place, the law permitted the tax on whisky to be paid, as on tobacco and on certain other articles, when it entered into consumption, or, in other words, when it was taken out of bond and placed on the market. This law was found to afford great opportunities, so far as whisky was concerned, for fraud and corruption. We all remember the startling era of the whisky frauds, which seemed to shake the Government to its center and to threaten the overthrow of our institutions. The whisky ring for a time seemed stronger than the Government, and while some of its leaders were acquitted, it is thought that very many escaped justice. This startling experience resulted in a careful revision and change of the internal-revenue laws so far as whisky was concerned, and in 1868 the law provided, among other things, that distilled spirits should be taken possession of by the Government when distilled, placed in a warehouse provided by the owner but under the care of a United States officer, who should carry the key, and that within one year from the time of its manufacture the owner should pay the Government tax and take possession of it, or, in other words, take it out of bond.

This law was found to work well, and under it there were very few complaints of fraud; but in 1878, at the instance and request of the whisky producers, this bonded period was extended from one to three years. This extension was asked and granted on the ground that there was an overproduction in the country, and that the consumption was not equal to the production. The distillers of whisky asked time to reduce their surplus by the reduction of the manufacture of distilled spirits until the production and the consumption should become equal. Otherwise they claimed that bankruptcy and financial ruin were inevitable. Their agents and attorneys presented this question to Congress, and the period was extended from one to three years, and has never since been reduced.

At the time of the passage of this law, making the bonded period three years instead of one, as it had been before, the product was less than 60,000,000 gallons. Instead of the reduction which was promised, the product the next year, 1879, reached 71,000,000 gallons, and during the next year, 1880, the product reached 90,000,000 gallons; and during the next year, 1881, it reached 117,000,000 gallons; in 1882, 105,000,000 gallons, and in 1883, 74,000,000 gallons. There remained in the warehouses, after all sales and exportations had been made, at the end of the fiscal year 1879, 19,000,000 gallons; at the end of the fiscal year 1880, 31,000,000 gallons; at the end of the fiscal year 1881, 64,000,000 gallons; at the end of the fiscal years 1882 and 1883, 80,000,000 gallons; the same amount in round numbers each year. This is the extent of the overproduction of distilled spirits of which the owners now complain and for which and on account of which they ask relief.

On the 1st day of January last the amount of the overproduction or amount on hand in bond in the various warehouses of the country was 64,000,000 gallons, a marked reduction over the amount on hand the previous year; and which, in view of the history of the years preceding, can only be attributed to the refusal of the Forty-seventh Congress to grant the extension then asked, and it is fair to infer that a refusal by the Forty-eighth Congress to grant the extension now asked will result in a corresponding reduction of the stock on hand. This, in my judgment, is the remedy and the only remedy. As long as Congress gave the manufacturers of this product the legislation they sought they constantly increased their production and magnified the evil of which they complain. But when this aid was refused, they at once began to correct the evil and reduce the amount on hand. Whenever the owners of distilled spirits make up their minds that this tax is to be paid, not extended indefinitely, but paid, then and not till then will this clamor for more legislation in the interest of this traffic cease.

This special legislation is denied to other classes; why should it be granted to this? The farmer pays his taxes on his farm and home, on his cattle and on his crops, within a year, and in case he fails to do so a heavy penalty is first added, and this is soon followed by the sale of the property. The owner of the lowly cottage and scanty home fares no better, and has no relief from the inevitable tax-gatherer, whose coming is as certain as death itself. The manufacturer, who furnishes food and raiment to thousands of operatives and workmen, to men, women, and children who depend on their daily labor for their daily bread, often finds the market overstocked and his branch of industry overdone, and yet he must pay his taxes all the same. So it is with all classes, in all trades and in every condition of life, and we cannot see why the maker or dealer in whisky should receive relief. There is many a home sold for taxes; others are sold under a mortgage; the poor are made homeless and houseless, and yet the Government is not asked to aid them in their destitution. Why should it aid this class?

It is said that the dealers and manufacturers of distilled spirits should be granted this relief because of the excessive tax imposed by the internal-revenue law on their peculiar product. In my judgment this tax of 90 cents a gallon has been and still is a source of great wealth to this class of men. It has enabled them to crush out the small distilleries and to drive out of the trade the small dealers who are not able to advance the tax, and it has in this way brought the manufacture and sale of distilled spirits into fewer hands, and in this way it has enabled them to combine into one of the most powerful monopolies on this continent. No organization in this country is so complete or so thorough. They have their constitutions and by-laws, their officers and agents, their attorneys and newspapers. No such arrogance is elsewhere to be found. They seek to dominate State and national legislation and to control State and national politics. Their agents and attorneys are in the office of every hotel in Washington and in the galleries and corridors of this national Capitol. No business carried on in this country anywhere between the two oceans yields such a profit or has in hand for purposes of corruption such a fund. Such an organization is greatly to be feared and its influences greatly to be deplored. To say the least, such a combination is not entitled to special favors or special privileges.

They claim that we discriminate against whisky, that they are only asking to have the same privileges which are granted to others, and to have the same rule applied to their goods that is applied to other wares. It is true, that in the case of beer and tobacco, the only other articles now paying an internal-revenue tax, the tax is only collected when the article is placed on the market or entered for consumption. In these instances the owner is compelled to pay the tax on them and place them on the market within a very short time to avoid loss, as the value deteriorates rapidly with age. These articles must necessarily be put on the market very soon for this reason, and in addition to this the owner loses the interest on the investment, and hence there can be no inducement for him to hold back from the Government the tax.

The only other instance cited by the friends of this measure, in which they claim there is a discrimination against the whisky traffic, is in relation to the importation of foreign goods.

The importer of foreign goods can unload his vessel, place his goods in bond, and pay the duty within one year. If he fails to pay the tax within this time he is required to pay the Government 10 per cent. on their value, which entitles him to an extension of two years. This gives the importer, in all, three years in which to pay his duties or taxes by his paying 10 per cent. of the value of the goods in addition to his taxes. This is done for commercial reasons which do not apply to the manufacturers of whisky. If they did, the argument amounts to nothing in this case, for the distillers of whisky already have three years without paying a cent. The importers are not asking for any extension, and why should any further extension be granted to the distillers?

In addition to this, allow me to add that the importer does not often take advantage of the extension granted him, for the reason that he is the loser by such extension. If he leaves his goods in bond for one year only they deteriorate in value; he loses the interest on the investment and has to pay the cost of storage; while the distiller always claims the last day of the time allotted him in which to pay his taxes, as his property greatly increases in value, and in this respect yields him an annual profit of 10 or 15 per cent. at least.

If the present tax on whisky is excessive, it is not our fault. This Congress did not pass this law, nor has this Congress been asked by anybody to reduce the tax. The tax on whisky is made 90 cents a gallon, 300 to 400 per cent. the cost of production, for a reason. By common consent it is admitted that whisky shall pay a small part of the taxes that it imposes on this country. The manufacturer of iron and brass and steel and copper, the manufacturer of cloth and leather and carpets and stoves, the manufacturer of boots and shoes and hats and bonnets, the manufacturer of furniture and dishes, of plows and spades bless mankind and make the world better and happier, while the use of intoxicating liquors as a beverage, the only purpose for which this bourbon or rye whisky, which becomes valuable by age, is used, is a curse to the world, and leaves in its track poverty and want, misery and death, debt and taxation.

This bill is in the interest of but one kind of distilled spirits, as is shown by the recent letter of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, what is known as bourbon or rye whisky, of which there is now on hand about 45,000,000 gallons. This is utterly useless when it is first made, and only becomes ripe, as they call it, and fit for use by age. It is said to require at least three years for it to go through the process of aging, so as to be ready for the market, and it increases in value from year to year thereafter. This is another explanation of the desire to have the Government extend the period in which these taxes are to be paid, as during this time the whisky is greatly increased in value. It becomes a speculation to the owner, while none of the profits can reach the Government.

The high wines and cheap whiskies used in part for mechanical and medicinal purposes do not require age, and hence this law is not specially in the interest of those engaged in their manufacture. Hence we are called upon to legislate especially in the interest of a class of liquors used exclusively for drinking purposes. This makes the bill more repugnant if possible, and I am for this reason less willing to vote for it. I object to this Government going into partnership with men who are engaged in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors. And if there were no objection to this, the terms of copartnership are unfair. The Government is to have 4½ per cent. interest on the taxes, while the owner gets all the increase which comes from aging the whisky, which is at least three or four times as much as the interest.

It is said by some of the advocates of this bill that the Treasury is now overflowing and that we do not need the money, and that for this reason we should grant the extension proposed in this bill. To this I want to protest. We need every dollar of the money now in the Treasury and every dollar that will become due on the fifty or sixty million gallons of whisky which will be required to pay its tax within the next two years. We need it to educate the army of illiterates that now threaten to control the elections in this country and bring upon us the curse of communism and anarchy and ruin. We need it to increase the pensions of soldiers already pensioned and to pension those who have up to this time been shamefully neglected. We need it to educate the tribes of roaming Indians that now cover the plains and mountains of the far-off West. We need it to educate and take care of the neglected and forsaken inhabitants of Alaska. We need it to complete the unfinished war vessels that now lie at the dock without machinery or armament or guns. We need it to build up a commerce that shall bear the American flag in every port and sweep the waves of every sea.

It is said that if we refuse to pass this bill the country will be thrown into a fearful panic and a large part of the business men of the country will be ruined financially. This I do not believe. Financial disaster would more likely follow the passage of this bill. It certainly would in case the internal-revenue taxes should not be repealed. If this bill should become a law a new impetus would be given to the manufacture of whisky and the product would again be greatly increased, depending on another extension of time, which, if refused, would certainly entail disaster and ruin on the men who seem to have an overweening confidence in their ability to control legislation.

To show by still further proof that this threat of financial ruin is not well founded I will call attention to the threats of the same character which were made during the Forty-seventh Congress. During the last hours of that Congress we were assured that we were on the verge of an impending crisis which would hurl upon us bankruptcy and ruin. The tones of eloquence that sounded the touching alarm on that occasion and the earnest appeals on the same subject that preceded it for weeks before seem still ringing in these halls. We saw the dark clouds, the fearful forked lightning, and heard the muttering thunder. The bill did not pass, but the storm did, for the panic never came. And so it will be again, for the evil forebodings to which we have listened this session will as certainly pass by as they did before. The panic did not come then and will not come now.

There is one other thing which strikes me as being very novel. The advocates of this measure at times denounce every attempt to bring into this discussion any moral considerations whatever. Temperance cranks and temperance fanatics were assailed in the opening of the discussion, without even stopping to inquire whether there was any such thing as a whisky crank or whisky fanatic. At another time these champions of the whisky traffic assume the rôle of temperance reformers, and deprecate with holy horror the thought of throwing upon the market cheap whisky, which they insist will be the result of a refusal to pass this bill. For once they seem willing to join hands with the friends of temperance in saving from ruin and inebriation the fair sons of Columbia's soil. And yet they do not want any of this precious stuff wasted; they want it all drunk, they want it all consumed, and consumed in this country, for they have a fearful dread of its being exported. That does not trouble me in the least. I shall give them my written consent to carry it to the ends of the earth and drop it in the sea, only I shall pity the fish.

The charge has more than once been made that this bill is being opposed by those who do so for the reason that they want in this way to facilitate the early repeal of the internal-revenue taxes. To this I want to enter for myself a disclaimer. I am not in favor of repealing or reducing the tax on whisky. As long as whisky is drunk and as long as we owe a national debt I want this revenue to continue. I think, however, that we should abolish as far as posssble our revenue system and revenue officers, and in this way save in each year many millions of dollars. The Government can doubtless collect this tax without the aid of collectors as at present appointed and located.

Whisky will cost the poor man who is so unfortunate as to be its victim just as much when the tax is removed as it does now. There never was, as is the case with other products, any relation between the cost of producing whisky and the cost at retail. The one has nothing to do with the other. The only question is, how much will the man who drinks it pay for it rather than do without it? This is the question.

Most articles of merchandise are sold at a profit on the cost of production of 25 to 50 per cent. at the highest. Whisky is sold at retail at several hundred per cent. profit. The wholesale and retail dealers combine and dictate their own conditions, and the poor drinker tamely submits. And then they boast that since 1862 they paid a thousand million dollars to the expenses of the Government. They did not pay a dollar of it. The hungry child that went to bed supperless, the heart-broken wife who went half clad in the winter storm to earn bread for her babes, the poor laboring man who spends his week's wages for drink instead of carrying it to his family, have paid their full share. The men who buy it at retail for drink, for medicine, and for the arts pay the whole of it.

Gentlemen need not tell me that whisky helped put down the rebellion. The brave boys to whom we owe promises never redeemed and pensions never paid did this, and I would rejoice at the thought of turning over to the suffering soldiers, to the trembling widow who remains unpensioned, and to the helpless and fatherless children of the brave men who dared to stand by the old flag this large sum which we are asked in this bill to remit for the time being to the distillers and owners of whisky.

We have been asked to ignore the moral aspect of this question. When we are asked to grant a special favor to a particular article, can we not inquire to what uses this article is to be applied? When we are asked to pass over all the great realm of productions and select one as the object of special legislation, can not we inquire as to the effect of the only use to which this commodity is applied? It is impossible to avoid doing this, as is evidenced by the fact that the friends of this bill were the first to discuss the moral phase of the question and have kept it up all the way through this discussion. They felt the necessity of this and began to defend before they were attacked, and from the first speech to the last thus far they have felt the necessity of meeting this phase. They have steadily sought to divert attention from the moral phase of the question by the statement that it is a purely business measure, connected with a branch of industry that is adding constantly to the national resources.

It has been said, and truly, that this is a great business, involving millions of dollars, but I deny that it is any source of wealth to this country. You can not separate a business from its legitimate results, and the legitimate results of the whisky business, trace it where you will, are poverty, suffering, degradation, disease, and death. Every dollar it brings into the coffers of its venders is reeking with blood and tears. The modicum of value it may have as a mechanical and medicinal agency is overborne and buried out of sight under the untold burdens it binds upon humanity. Beneath its touch the strongest arm falls paralyzed and the clearest eye grows dim. Youth, strong, ambitious, glorious youth, becomes feeble and palsied as with age at the blighting touch of this monster; keen intellects lose their godlike powers and grovel in the dust. Kind hearts are turned into demons, and blight and blast, without a throb of remorse, their own most cherished ones. Home and friends and peace and honor all go down in one surging sea of horror, and the starless night of a drunkard's eternity closes over more than 60,000 souls in our own country every year. And yet gentlemen can stand here and make a jest of intemperance, and wreathe their lips with sarcastic smiles at the idea of there being any question of temperance in a whisky-extension bill. The financial ruin so touchingly depicted here as consequent upon the failure of this bill will, if it should follow, not be the first financial ruin that has dated back to whisky. The country is full of the scarred and blackened ruins of homes and fortunes and the darker ruins of noble lives, the wrecks of manhood and womanhood, the foul and festering things cast up from the mire and filth of intemperance, which but for this "legitimate business" might have been radiant with the attributes of Heaven.

There is no turning away or ignoring these considerations or casting them aside with a flippant jest. They confront us on the floor of this House hidden in the provisions of this bill; and disguise it as you may, it is the increasing and awakening conscience of this nation that is making it more and more difficult for the whisky power to succeed in its arrogant demands. It is the gleam of light on the horizon of the future, the one bow of promise against the dark background of the present, that men are coming to understand more fully and appreciate more correctly the animus of this business. And the time is coming when our children will blush for us that we should ever have temperized with this deadliest foe to human progress and human happiness.

Mr. McKINLEY. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROWN], and at the conclusion of his remarks I yield the remainder of the time to my colleague on the committee [Mr. BLACKBURN].

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, it is evident that the friends of this measure are anxious to be taxed, and it is also evident that they are loath to pay their taxes. Although it has not been demonstrated that they are in favor of having this tax remain upon their commodity, I think my honorable colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] came very near so demonstrating, and I have not a single doubt but that it is a fact.

We all know, sir, that these taxes have been imposed, that their imposition has created a monoply, that the impurities and poisons that have made the modern product doubly dangerous have increased as the monopoly has grown in power and wealth. It is apparent, also, that if this tax can be continued and the payment postponed for a while longer and finally indefinitely postponed, it will be a very good thing for the whisky manufacturers. I do not see how anything could be clearer than that proposition. That this is the motive prompting the beneficiaries of this bill I have no question or doubt. It is apparent on every hand. It is more and more manifest every hour as the discussion proceeds. It is not only being demonstrated here to-day, but it has been established heretofore. These men came here before and got an extension under the plea of poverty. They are asking for an extension to-day; and who shall say when this extension expires that they will not be here on the floor of Congress demanding with all the vigor that they can control that there shall be a further extension?

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] calls it an "extension," and because it is an extension from his point of view there is nothing in the Constitution to prevent the granting of it. He also calls it a "stay of proceedings!" By that name it has not so rank a smell. By that name the strict constructionist will not be frightened away from its support. If, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] suggests, it is a "loan," then I suppose the gentleman from Connecticut would concede it to be unconstitutional. He would hold, I presume, that it is not the province of this Government to go in the loaning business to the whisky men, at 4½ per cent. or any other per cent. I suppose he would concede that. But since he can call it by some other name, that is to say, an "extension" or "stay of proceedings," the whole phase of the question is changed and it is no longer unconstitutional So, Mr. Chairman, it depends altogether upon what you call the trick whether it is constitutional or unconstitutional!

Now, I call it a loan. I do not see how it can be denominated otherwise than a loan when there is to be an interest paid upon it by the terms of the bill itself. But I do not care whether it is constitutional or otherwise; whether you term it a loan or a stay of proceedings, it is wrong, and that fact should drive every man in this House from its support. It has no element of equity in it. It was a grievous fault to extend it before. It would be a crime to extend the payment of this tax now. Gentlemen on the other side say that this particular interest is being persecuted on account of the alleged immorality of the business. I say in reply to that there is no evidence whatever of that. They do not admit themselves that there is immorality in the business, but they indulge in a good deal of talk about the morality of it, as if that quality were lacking. They commenced the discussion themselves and admit that they do so because they find that the moral sentiment of the country is against it. If the moral sentiment of the country is against their business it is because they have invited that judgment by their own imprudence and avarice by giving poison in the place of the best and purest commodity possible.

The public sentiment about which the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY] complains is not unnatural. He waxes warm and at times eloquent on account of the persecutions about to befall this traffic because its taxes must be paid. He charges the unparalleled cruelty he pictures all upon the temperance cranks. He would seem to include all who oppose this extension in that category. If so, he will find their name is legion, and I shall be much surprised if they are not increased when the exact demands of the whisky ring are fully understood by the country. Was more offensive proposition ever introduced into this Chamber? I do not believe it. It is a proposition to single out the most odious business known to our people and extend to it special privileges. All the sophistry its friends may bring to its defense never can divest it of this plain and unmistakable truth.

Nothing can be more certain than that the manufacture of this commodity will increase with every extension granted by the Government. It is not only logical that it should be so, but it has been demonstrated that it is so. The irresistible conclusion is that this is but the beginning—no, not the beginning, for there has been a previous extension—it is the continuing of a series of extensions, which mean that the tax will never be paid. Is this, sir, the reform to which gentlemen on the other side have invited the country? Is this Government to embark, under the guidance of reformers, into the insurance business, and as a beginning assume the hazard of "futures" on whisky? If it were a pure speculation on the part of the Government, some might justify the proceeding; but it is not even that. She takes all the risk and shares none of the profits.

When and where will this legislation end? If Congress is to come to the rescue of this traffic because there is an overproduction, will it turn a deaf ear whenever there is an overproduction of iron, calico, or potatoes? My constituents produce 40,000 barrels of petroleum each day. There is now a surplus of over 30,000,000 barrels. Why not lend them sufficient money to carry their oil until they can bull the market? Are the producers of petroleum less deserving than the producers of rum?

Mr. BLACKBURN. My colleague on the committee [Mr. MCKINLEY] having yielded to me the remainder of his time, I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER].

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, Congress is asked by this bill to stay the collection of taxes on whisky due and falling due for a period of two years. I do not think we gain anything by setting up the fiction that this is a release from a penalty or that it is a loan, for in plain terms it is a proposition to stay the collection of certain taxes for a certain consideration, that is to say, 4½ per cent. per annum on the amount. That is just what it is, and all it is.

This demand is made upon three grounds: First, that taxes ought not to be collected on commodities upon which they are levied until such commodities go into consumption. Now, Mr. Chairman, is that the correct theory of taxation? Are taxes for the support of governments levied and collected upon that theory? Do governments wait on consumption for taxes? Why, sir, government rests for its support upon the property of all the people. The taxes collected in all our States are collected upon quite a different theory, and although public policy or commercial policy may dictate certain regulations, as in the case of whisky or of imported goods, allowing a certain time in which they may remain in bond before taxes are demanded, the theory is not, however, that the taxes are not, or ought not to be, collectible or payable until the duties go into actual or final consumption, as is claimed in this bill or in the arguments in its support upon this floor. Rather, if any such theory has support at all, it is that the taxes are payable when the commodities upon which they are levied go into commerce, not into final consumption. When goods are imported into the United States and are removed from the custom-house they do not go at once into consumption in the sense in which it is argued that whisky must go into consumption before the taxes on it are collected. They go into trade; so whisky, though in bond, enters into commerce. More or less of it is changing hands every day by the transfer of certificates, the same as warehouse receipts for grain or anything else, and always with the knowledge that taxes must be paid on it.

The second ground upon which the stay is asked is that there is a surplus of this commodity, with a bad market. Now, Mr. Chairman, there is an old law of trade which was laid down more than a hundred years ago by Lord Lauderdale, who first announced the true doctrine of supply and demand, or, more strictly, the conditions which affect the value of commodities. This law is now recognized throughout the commercial world as a fundamental law in the science of exchanges. There are four ways, he says, in which values are affected: First, they are affected by a diminution of quantity; second, by an increase of demand; third, by an increase in the quantity; and fourth, by a diminution of demand.

Now we have here an oversupply of whisky relatively to other things. But the markets of the world are open to it, and if left to regulate itself the supply will adjust itself to demand. The whole matter may be stated in a nutshell. The real truth of the case is this: Meat is high; whisky is low; too much corn has been put into whisky relatively and too little into meat. Now, the natural remedy is to put more corn into meat and less into whisky, the effect of which will be to lower the price of meat and raise the price of whisky. Instead of that, we are asked to interfere by legislation and prevent the natural course of things under the laws of trade; in my opinion an unwise thing to do. While overproduction in the aggregate is impossible, disproportionate production is taking place all the time, and markets are all the time changing under these conditions and under this law of the relation of supply to demand; and if things are left to correct themselves under the pressure of low prices or high prices they are always sure in the end to do that, although losses may be inflicted and are inflicted by the ups and downs of markets.

Why, Mr. Chairman, in the last two years there has been a shrinkage in railway securities of more than $500,000,000 from excessive railroad construction and overissue of securities, all the result of the violation of this great economic law governing values. There has been a shrinkage of millions in the value of iron products and in the value of the products of many other industries. Relatively, these things have been produced in excess of other things; but all this must be left to work its own cure under the law of supply and demand, and any attempt to interpose legislation can only make things worse. The case before us is not an exception.

If we pass this bill what would be the result? Exactly what has been stated by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] and others on this floor. The quantity of whisky will certainly be increased, because under the operation of the laws of trade these holders, instead of selling, as is said they must in order to pay the tax, will withhold the article from sale, not being compelled to pay the tax; and the withdrawal of it from market, except at better prices, will change the relation of the quantities on the market to the demand, and the result will be a rise in price. Yes, under this bill the price of whisky will as certainly rise as the bill passes; and with a rise in price the production will be increased. And the only effect this bill, if it passes, could have would be to put off the evil day; but the consequences would be the worse when they come.

We have been cautioned many times against introducing the moral question into this debate, and I have considered only the economic aspect of the question. But while it is true that the States alone can regulate the liquor traffic within the States, am I bound in levying taxes for revenue to shut my eyes to the consequences of such taxes or to any indirect good to result therefrom? Am I bound to ignore the fact that while whisky pays seventy-five millions of taxes it necessitates or is the cause of a hundred and fifty millions of other taxes? Am I not rather in good conscience and in the interest of wise public policy bound to consider these very things? In levying duties on imports I hold that we ought in the public interest to consider the consequences to production, commerce, and trade of all the duties levied. I apply the same principle here.

The third reason offered for the passage of this bill is that the Government does not need this money. Perhaps not. But I am not among those who are frightened at a large revenue in the presence of an interest-bearing debt of thirteen hundred millions of dollars, more than three hundred millions of which is payable at the option of the Government. Why are we alarmed at the surplus in the Treasury or a large revenue when we have large pension claims to pay and a large indebtedness to extinguish? What would we think of a man who owed $10,000, payable at his option, expressing an uneasiness at having in his possession $1,000? We would naturally say, "Pay your debt." Now, until we have paid our debt I do not think there is any occasion for so much alarm at even the amount of revenue we are now collecting; although I am quite prepared to vote for the reduction of taxes in a proper way, I am prepared, Mr. Chairman, to reduce the internal revenues in part, and to consolidate and modify our present system, but not to abolish it entirely, especially the tax upon whisky.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] has expired.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COX].

Mr. BELFORD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I would yield to the gentleman from Colorado for a question if I had the time.

Mr. BELFORD. The gentleman used to be my schoolmaster when I was a boy. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But I hope I am not responsible for the present errors of my former pupil. [Renewed laughter.] I will say, however, that he was a very bright and intelligent pupil.

Mr. BELFORD. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, if he had the time necessary to answer it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COX] is entitled to the floor for five minutes.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee informally rose, and Mr. BLACKBURN took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that the President had approved and signed a bill of the following title:

An act (H. R. 4779) to change the name of the West Waterville National Bank of Oakland, in the State of Maine, to that of Messalonskee.

PAYMENT OF TAX ON DISTILLED SPIRITS.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I thank my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] for his courtesy, which enables me to present briefly my views on the bill now before the committee. While it would give me much pleasure to support the measure which has been so ably and zealously presented by its distinguished advocates, yet a sense of duty to my constituents constrains me to vote against it. The measure presented for the approval of this House by the friends of the bonded-whisky extension proposition is, that on all distilled spirits now remaining in distilleries or bonded warehouses upon which the tax has or shall become due after the 1st day of December, 1883, upon the request of the distiller or owner thereof, the period for the collecting of such tax shall be extended not more than two years, and for the indulgence thus granted by the Government the owners shall pay interest at the rate of 4½ per cent. per annum.

During the investigation of this subject we discover that the taxes due to the Government amount in the aggregate to about $66,000,000, or about one dollar and a quarter per capita for every man, woman, and child in the United States. Disrobed of all disguises, the naked proposition is that the people of the United States of all occupations and professions, who can be legitimately taxed only to pay the expenses of the Government, shall loan to this manufacturing industry this large sum of money at 4½ per cent. to carry on the business of manufacturing whisky, and to that extent become a copartner in the business. Such a proposition should have strong and overwhelming reasons to give it even the semblance of plausibility. The mere interest that it is proposed to pay is but a bagatelle when it is remembered that neither the Government with all its wealth nor individuals with gilt-edged paper could secure a loan of this magnitude at these rates for so short a time. Indeed the banks in many parts of the country are loaning money to the producing classes at the rate of 1 per cent. a month, while farmers are paying as high as 25 per cent. for advances and supplies with which to make their crops. In addition to this, while a vast surplus is gathered into the Treasury, with which the eyes of legislators are too often dazzled, and questionable appropriations made for which we can find no constitutional warrant, yet we should not ignore the fact that want and even destitution prevail in many parts of our country, and the husbandman is not requited for the toil he undergoes as he plods his weary way from early morn to dewy eve in his efforts to make both ends meet. What right have we then as the agents of those by whose permission we are here, to thus favor one industry at the expense of many others which are unquestionably equally meritorious?

It is true, as is said, that the Treasury is overflowing, and that the Government does not need this money, and that it would produce great hardships to collect it at this time. In a great country like ours, with such varied industries, I grant that if we can benefit one section or interest without doing manifest injustice to others, there is reason why we should do so; but, on the contrary, we should remember that paying taxes is no luxury, and that the best way to distribute our surplus is by lowering taxes and leaving the money in the hands of those who produce them.

It is not my purpose to treat either of the moral or ethical character of this question. That belongs to another forum; but I will deal with it as I would with any other legitimate business. Viewed in that light, let us see whether it is entitled to such indulgence at the hands of the Government.

This is the second time the whisky interest has made such an application. Prior to 1878 the bonded period was only one year, and it was to meet an overproduction that the law was changed to three years. Under this extension overproduction has taken place, and once more Congress has been invoked to stay the hand of the tax-gatherer, and it requires no foresight to anticipate, should we yield to this second demand, that Antæus-like, growing stronger by each touch of his mother earth, at the end of this two years it may again appear before Congress with stronger appeals for favors. On business principles, is the present request defensible? When the last forbearance was granted, these producers were notified they must be prepared for the worst; but, heedless, their productions have been stimulated instead of diminished, and when one runs in debt with a full knowledge of his inability to meet his indebtedness he is not deserving of sympathy.

Looking at this matter in another light, we see that the parties most involved are not those who are entitled to the greatest favor at the hands of the Government. They are not the poor and ignorant, whom it is our duty to aid in their distress, but, rather, intelligent and adroit speculators, who in their efforts to increase their store have overtraded; in the same way that a merchant who carries an overstock of goods, or the grain dealer and pork buyer, who, in endeavoring to corner the market, sometimes get cornered themselves. A man might import too large an amount of goods, and will it be insisted that the Government should wait until he had sold before collecting duties? And so in all enterprises. Men who engage in them must suffer the hardships which their own imprudence causes. I know it is insisted that if this tax is collected others will suffer besides the owners of these spirits; that a panic may be produced.

Such may be true, but I do not believe it. The same arguments might be introduced and the same results follow whenever these taxes are required to be paid. We should not run a paternal government; it is not in keeping with our institutions. But it is not my purpose to linger upon this branch of the subject. To me there is another and much stronger reason why I should antagonize this bill, and that is, the bonded-whisky interest is opposed to the abolition of the internal revenue, in which my people are vitally interested.

If the bonded period is extended for two years, there are sixty-six millions of reasons against the repeal of the internal-revenue law, for should this law be repealed during that extension, the tax due the Government on this whisky would be lost, and it is a most significant fact, that those who are suffering so many wrongs and outrages at the hands of the stipendiaries of the Government, as to keep up a continued warfare between the outraged citizen and revenue officers, find but few sympathizers among these bonded-spirits men. Even the small farmer who desires to distill the little fruits grown upon his premises, which otherwise must rot and perish upon his hands, receives no sympathy, but on the contrary, when his cause is advocated, fears are expressed lest he, through dishonest practices, may lessen the demand for their products. It is not the little distillers in the country who are to be benefited by this proposed indulgence, but whisky syndicates, who have had bourbon and the finer grades of rye whisky manufactured for speculative purposes.

The people of my State are quiet, law-abiding, and liberty-loving. Having no large cities in their midst, they do not move in masses; they are not man-worshipers, and are not led astray by mere sentiment. Isms take no root among them, but they think for themselves, and with them political principles are convictions. To them an excise law is peculiarly odious, and the system of espionage and outrage which it entails is almost unbearable. In this respect there has been no change for nearly one hundred years, for her Legislature in 1790 adopted the following resolution:

> That they strenuously oppose every excise and direct-taxation law, should any be attempted in Congress.

Thus it will be seen that her opposition to such taxation is as old as the Government itself. The first tax of this character was an act to aid in extinguishing a debt of the Revolution, and led to open resistance in Pennsylvania, and brought matters to the verge of a civil war. The second act existed from 1814 to 1818, and the last act went into effect in 1862. So that we see it has never been resorted to except as a war measure; and now twenty years have elapsed since the war has closed, and when the Treasury is overflowing it does really appear that this odious and iniquitous tax should be blotted out. Certainly in a country admired of all the world for its freedom and justice such taxes should cease when the necessity for them ceases.

But it may be asked, would I remove this excise tax, and leave the tax on the poor man's wool hat and blanket? To which I answer that the liberty of the citizen, his freedom from arrest, and the sanctity of his household is a more precious boon to a freeman than the small additional tax he may be compelled to pay by reason of the abolition of this tax, which now leads to corruption, oppression, and demoralization. On the ground of sound political morals I advocate it. You may goad a people on by injustice and oppression until they lose respect for the law, and bad men may secure the sympathy of good citizens in their resistance to those officers who prostitute their offices to serve political masters and feather their own nests. Four thousand partisans drilled in all the evolutions of machine politics are now employed at a cost of $6,000,000 to execute this law and serve the Republican party. I am fully aware it is not for the interest of this Government that party lines should be drawn on sectional divisions and geographical lines. Washington warned us against it and our civil war resulted from it. But so long as this law exists and is enforced as at present, there can be no Republican party at the South which will command or is entitled to the respect of either section. To show that I do not misrepresent the sentiment of my people in regard to this tax, I quote the following resolutions which were passed by our last General Assembly, which met in 1883:

> Whereas the present system of internal-revenue laws is oppressive and inquisitorial, centralizing in its tendencies, and inconsistent with the genius of a free people, legalizing unequal, expensive, and iniquitous taxation, and, as enforced in this State, is a fraud upon the sacred rights of our people and subversive of honest government, prostituted in many instances to a system of political patronage which is odious and outrageous, corrupting public virtue and jeopardizing public liberty, and sustained by intimidation and bribery on the part of revenue officials to debauch the elective franchise:
> Be it resolved by the General Assembly of North Carolina—
> 1. That the internal-revenue taxes of the United States ought to be repealed at once, with such provisions, by rebate of taxes or otherwise, as will be just to those who hold for sale articles for which taxes have been paid.

While I know the foregoing voices the popular sentiment of the people of the State, it is due to candor to say that there is an intelligent and very respectable portion of the people who prefer a reform of the tariff, to a repeal of the internal-revenue system. There is but one voice, however, as to the absolute necessity of a change in the method by which this tax should be collected. Hence it was that early in this session I introduced a bill which I believe meets this demand. It simplifies the machinery, dispenses with needless officers, and is far less expensive. So far as the spirits distilled from fruit is concerned, there is a universal demand for its repeal. The revenue derived from it is but little more than the cost of collection. And here the espionage and oppression as at present practiced in its collection is so odious, that honorable men often decline to distill their fruits, as they fear they may be compelled to surrender some of that manhood which enables one to walk with form erect the green heritage which God has given to man; for the laws are so complex, the political element is so intermingled with its administration that the manufacturer knows not the moment he may be arrested for violating a law he is endeavoring to obey, and torn from his family and compelled to attend a political trial at great inconvenience and expense. While, therefore, the same Legislature declared that the present tariff is unjust, unfair, and burdensome, it recognized that Congress had power to lay and collect duties, but it said that this discretion ought to be exercised to raise a revenue not greater than is sufficient for the strictly economical administration of the Federal Government and the gradual reduction of the Federal debt, but the Government ought so to distribute the burdens of the tariff and the incidental protection given as justly and equally as possible to every part of the country and to all classes of the people, and it recognized the further principle that articles intended to be consumed as luxuries should be taxed higher than the necessaries of life, and distinctly declared that—

> If Congress should deem it impracticable to modify the present tariff, and at the same time abolish the internal-revenue taxes, as the lesser of the two evils we prefer the retention of the former and the abolition of the latter.

From these expressions of opinion it may be seen how universally the people of the State oppose internal revenue, and as a choice between the evils they prefer an abolition of this law to a reform of the tariff. Yet, while they desire to see a reform in the tariff, they are not free-traders, but on the contrary recognize that incidental protection accompanies every tariff that may be imposed. They recognize further that in a country of such vast magnitude, varied productions, and separate interests all should be so harmonized as to produce the least friction. The Constitution itself is a series of compromises, and most of the laws we enact are so framed as to conform themselves as far as possible to the conflicting views that may be entertained. In the same spirit I am ready to say to those who control the bonded-spirit interest that so long as it clings, as the "Old Man of the Sea," around the neck of the reforms which my people have a right to expect, it will meet with nothing but opposition at our hands. But, on the contrary, if met in a spirit of compromise and concession, they will not find us unreasonable. I know that the tobacco interest has from time to time received relief at the hands of the Government. Starting at 40 cents, the tax has been cut down to 8, and the producer is allowed to sell in the leaf one hundred pounds. With us the tobacco interest is now prosperous, and nothing affects it more disastrously than agitating for the removal of the tax. Therefore, if I am not mistaken, this interest, if the tariff reform demanded it, would be content to wait until the Government can repeal the whole remaining tax instead of removing it by degrees. But as to the distilled spirits, we insist that we have a right to demand of this Congress an entire repeal of the whole tax on spirits made from fruit, and such a modification of the method of collecting the tax from whisky as will bring relief to those who have so long suffered from the invasions of their homes, political prosecutions in court, sacrifices of their liberties, and the perpetuation of an Asiatic despotism upon this free American continent. Many I know will be content with nothing less than an entire abolition of the whole system, and while I agree with them, yet, in a spirit of compromise and concession, I do not desire to demand more than can be reasonably granted at this time, for I am confident that this Congress will do all that it can for the protection of the people in their rights and property.

This much, Mr. Chairman, I felt it my duty to say. While confident I am right, I can but recognize the fact there are three hundred and twenty-five members of this House who are equally entitled to their opinions on these economic questions as myself, and no one should insist that he alone is infallible.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. This question has been so ably and fully discussed on both sides that I should not presume to occupy for a moment the attention of this Committee of the Whole except for the purpose of correcting a statement made by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER], no doubt because of misinformation. That statement was to the effect that only those interested in the manufacture of rye and bourbon whiskies were pressing for the passage of this bill.

I represent a district that pays annually into the Treasury of the United States, mainly from the tax on distilled spirits, $14,000,000; more than is paid by any other district in the United States; more than is paid by all of the States west of the Mississippi River with the exception of Missouri; more than is paid by all of the New England States with Pennsylvania added; nearly as much as is paid by all of the State of Kentucky, or by all of Ohio, and within about three millions of as much as is paid by the Empire State, which the gentleman so ably represents. Yet of the immense amount of spirits from which this revenue is derived at least four-fifths is alcohol and what is known in the trade as high wines. Of that immense amount not over one-fourth at the outside is used for the purpose of making whisky, while three-fourths is used solely for purposes connected with the arts and manufactures. Yet every distiller in that district is urging the passage of this bill. Not only that, but every banker in the city of Peoria, where these distilleries are located, joins in urging the passage of this bill in the following language:

> We strongly urge the passage of the bonded-extension bill now before your committee for purely financial and commercial reasons.

It is not true that those interested in the manufacture of rye and bourbon whiskies are the only ones who favor the passage of this bill. It is urged by every distiller in every section of the country, and by hundreds of bankers and business men who are interested in business which will be affected by any disturbance or destruction of the distilling business.

The right of Congress to grant this relief is unquestioned. If Congress had the right in the first place to impose a tax on distilled spirits and to fix the time for the payment of that tax, it now has the right to abolish it entirely, to materially reduce it, or to change the time for its payment.

If this were a question coming to us for the first time, and we were now considering the feasibility of taxing distilled spirits, if we had agreed upon the amount of that tax and were discussing the limit of time in which it should be paid, and it was made to appear to us that it did not make a penny's worth of difference to the Government whether the period was fixed at one or three or five years, but it was shown that the failure to extend the limit of time to five years would be destructive and oppressive to the interest of distilling, then I apprehend gentlemen would not long hesitate how to vote on this bill.

It is a maxim of taxation, admitted everywhere and practiced without exception by every enlightened government of the world, that, taking into consideration the necessities of the government, every tax should be so assessed and collected as to bear in the least oppressive and burdensome manner upon the people. Whenever any tax is levied in violation of this principle, it is a cruel, wanton, tyrannical exercise of the power of government just in proportion to the extent that the principle is violated.

Now, stripping this question of all embarassments which have been thrown about it—taking away all the prejudices and all the brushwood—it is simply a question whether this Congress shall now change the time for the payment of taxes on spirits which were in bond on the 1st of December, 1883. Gentlemen know that the proposed change of the law will bring temporary relief to these distillers. The very circumstances of the case convince them of that. They know that an overproduction can not be forced upon an unwilling market without great loss to the producers of the article so sold. They have the evidence of distillers in every section of the country. From each of the four great cities, Chicago, Saint Louis, Louisville, and Cincinnati, the commercial centers of four great States of the West, come up appeals not only from distillers, but from every leading banker and almost every leading business man, praying for this extension. The advocates of this bill stand on very solid ground; and the reasons which would justify any member in refusing to vote for the passage of this bill should be of the most weighty character. What are these reasons?

It is claimed that this extension is a loan from the Government to the distillers; that it is a partnership between them. Why, sir, the Government has not a dollar of its taxes in possession; it can not collect a dollar until these taxes are due. The law makes no contract between the distiller and the Government. These taxes mature at different times within the next three years. At their maturity the distiller may or may not decide to rebond the spirits for two years. When the spirits were first distilled he might have paid the tax at that time instead of bonding them for three years; but because he saw fit to bond them for three years, did the Government thereby make a loan to him of the amount of the tax for the period of three years without interest? If he sees fit at the expiration of the three years to rebond his spirits, is that any more a loan for the coming two years than it was for the preceding three years?

But gentlemen say that the Government by doing this goes into partnership with the distillers. In what way does it go into partnership? Does the extension of the time create a partnership? If that is true, the Government has twice already extended the time, as gentlemen tell us, and according to their argument the Government has already twice gone into partnership with the distillers and is now in partnership with them. If the extension of the time is not what constitutes the partnership, is it the taking of 4½ per cent. interest that makes the partnership? If that is true, every borrower is in partnership with his lender, and the Government is in partnership with every one of its bondholders. This is not true, gentlemen. The Government is neither loaning this amount to the distillers nor is it in partnership with them. The declaration proceeds from a confusion of thought, and is simply an abuse of terms.

But gentlemen tell us further (and that appears to be the argument upon which they mainly rely) that inasmuch as there was an overproduction during the years of 1880 and 1881, following the former extension of the bonded period, the same causes will produce similar results, and we shall have similar overproduction if this bill be passed. Now, I do not know what right gentlemen have to assume this as a matter of fact. We know it is often said that "Experience is a dear school, but fools learn in no other." Certainly these gentlemen engaged in this business have seen the result of overproduction. Are we to assume that because they have been once brought to the brink of financial ruin and then relieved they will immediately rush to the edge of the precipice again? Gentlemen give us the figures by which they show the extent of this overproduction; but they tell us at the same time that it reached its maximum in 1881, when the production was 117,000,000 gallons; that it fell to 105,000,000 gallons in 1882, and 74,000,000 gallons in 1883. I submit that the evils of overproduction are already curing themselves.

But have gentlemen observed that this bill does not apply to spirits to be manufactured in the future? It applies only to spirits in bond on the 1st of December, 1883. Now, every gallon of spirits which was in bond at that time and for which the period would be extended by the passage of this bill must come directly in competition with all the spirits yet to be manufactured. Take the 1st day of April as an illustration. All spirits which may go into bond on the 1st day of next April can, if this bill should become a law, remain in bond only three years; the time would expire on the 1st day of April, 1887. Spirits which may have been in bond on the 1st day of April, 1883, will not, under the terms of the law, mature so as to authorize the collection of the taxes until the 1st day of April, 1888. Spirits which were in bond on the 1st day of April, 1882, will not have to be taken out of bond, if this bill should become a law, until the 1st day of April, 1887. Thus it will be seen that the overproduction which gentlemen claim was caused by the passage of the bill of 1880 will directly tend to prevent overproduction during the next three years, because the production can not for any great length of time materially exceed the consumption; and the spirits which may be manufactured during the next two years must come directly into competition with the surplus which has been manufactured within the last two years and as to which the bonded period will be extended.

But gentlemen say that these distillers ought to have known better, that it was their own fault, that they overstocked the market, that if they had exercised ordinary business oversight they would have confined production to the amount of consumption, and they would not be in their present financial dilemma.

Well, gentlemen, suppose this is true, have we any right as unprejudiced legislators to refuse them relief simply because they have made a mistake? Are we to fold our arms and assume a superiority and say because you could not foresee the dilemma in which you are now placed, therefore we will not give you any relief? Are we legislative schoolmasters to mark and punish business blunders of our constituents? Is it right for us if we are in a stanch boat alongside of a vessel which has sprung a leak when the crew of the sinking vessel reach out their hands and ask succor to fold our arms and say, "Oh, no, we will give you no succor; if you had only exercised business foresight you would have stopped the leak; because you did not do it we will let you sink?"

A MEMBER rose.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I can not yield, as I have barely time sufficient allowed me to say what I desire.

Yet, Mr. Chairman, that is precisely the principle the gentlemen now seek to apply in this case when we are asked to relieve these distillers.

Congress is all the time passing bills for the relief of men who have committed business blunders. What are your bankruptcy laws but wholesale bills passed for this purpose in behalf of those all over the country who have blundered or been unfortunate? Congress says because you have been so we will annul the force of your legal contracts, we will wipe out indebtedness between private individuals. But when these distillers come here they do not ask you to wipe out a dollar of their debt, but offer to pay it all in four years; and you say, "No, you committed a business blunder, and therefore we can not relieve you."

Now, gentlemen, if the Government needed this money a different view of the case would be presented. But we know and the people know we do not need this money. We know its coffers are overflowing. We know the Secretary of the Treasury two years ago in his annual message notified Congress that the annual surplus was so great he could not dispose of it economically, and advised there should be a reduction of taxation. We know and the people know Congress has not reduced taxation, and with the well-known difference of opinion which exists between the two classes of gentlemen composing this Congress—the one class advocating the taking of tax off woolen goods and boots and shoes and glassware and other articles of necessity on the part of the people, and the other class which insists on making whisky free, beer free, and tobacco free, no man can tell when taxation will be reduced nor how long the people will continue with their necks bowed down under the weight of this $100,000,000 of surplus taxation.

What will be done with this money? I have here a citation from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, which is as follows:

The only United States bonds which are now payable at the pleasure of the Government are the 3 percents, being $305,529,000; those which next become redeemable are the $250,000,000 of 4½ percents, on September 1, 1891. The $737,620,700 of 4 percents and the $325,850 of refunding certificates are redeemable July 1, 1907.

The estimates for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, show a surplus revenue of $85,000,000 per annum. This is enough to pay all the 3 percents in about three and one-half years, and before the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887. This surplus kept up for the four succeeding years, to September 1, 1891, would be more than $350,000,000, or $100,000,000 more than enough to pay all the bonds then falling due. The same annual surplus until July 1, 1907, would amount, with the $100,000,000 left after paying the 4½ percents, to about $1,460,000,000, while the whole amount of the debt then redeemable is less than $740,000,000. The estimated surplus of $85,000,000 a year would pay the whole amount of the interest-bearing debt in about fifteen years. The only authority possessed by the Treasury whereby it can restore to business the surplus moneys thus accumulated is that given to the Secretary by the act of March 3, 1881, by which he may at any time apply the surplus money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to the purchase or redemption of United States bonds. This can now be done to other than the 3 percents only by the payment of a large and increasing premium thereupon. And when it is considered that nearly one-half of the interest-bearing debt of the United States is held by national banks, State banks, savings-banks, and trust companies, and much other of it by private trustees and other persons acting in fiduciary capacity, who have no wish to surrender these securities, the difficulty of acting under the provision cited is manifest. Moreover, it can not be assumed that the estimated surplus for the current and next years under existing laws will remain at the same rate in succeeding years. The increasing population and swelling business of the country will add to, rather than take from, the amount of the surplus as now estimated, while the decrease of interest on the public debt, and probably of the amount disbursed by the pension bureau, as arrears of pensions are paid off, should diminish expenditures.

It gives us the financial condition of the country. We are told in effect there are only about $300,000,000 now which can be paid at the option of the Government, and that after the $300,000,000 are paid there can be no more paid except by going into the market and paying a high premium to the brokers until 1891, and then only $250,000,000; that the balance of the debt runs up to 1907. What shall be done with this money? We see the currency being contracted; we see the financial condition of the country disturbed; we see paralysis of all sorts of business. It is in a juncture like this when the Secretary of the Treasury is embarrassed to know how economically to dispose of this surplus that a great interest comes to Congress, an industry that has paid over ten hundred million of dollars into the Treasury; an industry without which to-day this Government could not maintain its present financial condition; an industry tendering ample security in one hand with fair interest in the other, and asks simply time in order that it may be relieved from its temporary distress. Within the next two or three years' length of time or more, if this bill should pass, then Congress may possibly have nerve to reduce taxation, and if it does not within that time, the people will have an opportunity to elect another Congress that will reduce taxation.

My friends and gentlemen of the temperance element here oppose this bill on moral grounds they say. Now, I yield to no gentleman in my temperance principles. I agree with them in the darkest picture they have painted of the destruction and suffering and ruin caused by intemperance. But I can not for the life of me understand how they propose to arrest this evil by making whisky cheap. I can not for the life of me understand how they propose to promote temperance by such legislation as will enable a man to get drunk for 10 cents when it now costs him 50 cents or a dollar.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask, Mr. Chairman, by unanimous consent that my colleague's time be extended five minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and it is ordered accordingly.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to know how it becomes possible that temperance can be promoted by these gentlemen joining hands with the high-tariff advocates on one side and those gentlemen from the South who propose to make whisky free on the other. For my own part I like to see a monopoly in the whisky business. I should like to see all the distilleries in the United States concentrated in one county or one township or one town. They could be more readily controlled, and their contaminating influence could not be so readily spread abroad among the people. Do these gentlemen expect by uniting themselves with such allies to succeed in abolishing the tax on whisky altogether? Do they expect to be able to so change the law as to permit these little distilleries to be scattered all over the country in every direction, distilling brandy from fruits, or whisky from grain, and promoting and increasing this nefarious business in every township and county throughout the country? This may be practical temperance as they see it; but I confess that I can see no aid to the temperance question and no adjunct to the temperance reform movement by such legislation as that.

But, sir, we are told that if this bill passes, that if this tax limit is extended, within that time probably the tax upon whisky will be abolished altogether, and therefore the Government will lose this revenue. Now I have only this to say in that connection: These gentlemen must admit that if this bill does not pass the holders of whisky must advance the tax whether they can sell the article or not. I want to know of these gentlemen who are urging that objection whether it is right and proper on the part of a great government to compel men to pay 90 cents a gallon tax on their whisky and afterward, with this liquor upon their hands, to abolish the tax altogether and cause them to suffer the loss that would necessarily follow. But I do not believe that the tax upon whisky will be abolished. It never will be, except by a combination of such elements as we have seen here; that is, unless our high temperance friends unite with the high-tariff men and join themselves together with the gentlemen from the South who complain of the exactions and oppressions of the Federal officials throughout the South. It can not be unless these shall combine to abolish it. For my part I am in favor of maintaining the tax; and I say to all of these gentlemen that it will be a bad day for any men, for any set of men, or for any political party in this country that takes the tax off whisky. It is a tax that is more lightly paid and less oppressive than the tax upon any other business. It is a tax levied upon luxuries which are pernicious and mischievous, and so long as a single manufactured article continues to pay duties to support the Government of this country people will never consent that whisky, the agent of so much evil, shall be made free.

And now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, allow me to say that the passage of this bill will bring relief to all persons engaged in the distilling business. It will bring relief to every surety on every distiller's bond who is liable to be compelled to advance this enormous tax to save the principal. It will bring relief to every bank that has advanced money on warehouse certificates or is in any way connected with the business. It will bring relief to the great business centers, and to the business interests in the four great States of Illinois, of Missouri, Ohio, and Kentucky. It will hurt nobody. It will violate no law; it will weaken no security; it releases no claim; it contravenes no sound principle of legislation; it can do no possible harm. I have seen, Mr. Chairman, before now the red flag of the constable floating over the goods of a debtor which were about to be sold, but I never yet knew of a case where that debtor came to his creditor with ample security and a fair interest when the creditor did not need the money and asked him to grant an extension which was refused. And I tell you, gentlemen, that I can see no difference between an inexorable Government creditor and a private individual creditor. [Applause.]

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I have watched the course of this debate with a great deal of interest and care, and have observed in it some anomalous features. When this bill came into the House with a report from the Committee on Ways and Means I naturally supposed that it came with the sanction and recommendation of that committee and would secure the support of its members on the floor. But I observe every member of the minority—the Republican minority of that committee—speaking against the bill and giving emphatic expression to their sentiments in opposition to it. I have seen the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] of that committee, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT], and my colleague from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] of the Democratic side of that committee, on the floor speaking against the bill. We all know that the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], who is always frank and outspoken in his opinion, is opposed to the bill. That leaves the distinguished chairman of the committee [Mr. MORRISON] from Illinois, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD], and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] as the sole supporters of the bill upon this floor from that committee, with one member of it unheard from. I refer to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT].

Now, I naturally inquire, knowing the methods of committee investigation and procedure in reporting bills, as I do, by what Cæsarian operation was this thing taken untimely from that committee and brought into the House? How came it here? Who authorized it to come here? Bills ought to come with the sanction of the majority, with the approval of the majority, with the recommendation of the majority of the committee, and without such sanction they have no business here. We have more well-considered and well-matured legislation on the Calendars backed by the unanimous recommendation of committees than we can dispose of.

But the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] tells us that it had a report and a committee at its back and a sire two years ago; that it had a right noble sire—the distinguished Speaker of the House. Indeed, sir, it had; a splendid gentleman, who to-day, perhaps, occupies a higher position than any other statesman in this country in the confidence and affections of his countrymen. He stood sponsor for it then, but to his credit be it said his name has never from that day to this been linked with that bill on this floor or upon the records of this House. It went through this House with the wave of his hand and an almost whispered assurance, so high was the confidence of the House in him and so pure did we know his integrity to be, as we know it yet; and if he erred in that, it was an error to which he was moved by overurgent and pressing friends, and because he himself had not then come to understand the real character of the bill. And, furthermore, he had that other all-powerful incentive, a constituency deeply interested.

That bill went to the Senate, and that greatest of journals in the world the New York Herald tore the veil from about it and opened the eyes of the Senate, opened the eyes of the country upon it, and exposed it to view in its true light. The thing was worked and kneaded over, patched up, and done all new in the Senate, and sent back here after long months of labor and travail there. And when it came back its own father did not know it and would not own it. The House refused to own it and would not recognize it. Why, sir, did not the gentleman from Kentucky tell us that repeated, persistent, and constant efforts were made to get it up for further consideration in this House, all of which ignominiously failed, and they never got sixty votes for it from that day to this.

Why, sir, the veil has been torn from it, its deformity has been exposed, its true character has been made known. The same old pirate crew have been uncovered from behind the hulks and found to be there, all dressed anew, with a new-rigged ship, fresh sails, a new banner, a new watchword, new officers striding the quarter-deck; but the same old crew is behind the hulks that were there in 1866, 1867, and 1868.

Now, what is this bill? It stands without a legitimate parent upon this floor. It has been brought by personal importunity here and pressed upon our consideration. What is it? And ought we to give it consideration and passage? It certainly needs consideration.

Mr. Chairman, this measure comes too late to begin with. It is at the wrong end of the road. If it had been proposed at the beginning of this legislation on whisky taxation there might have been a reason for it. It was tried then and proved a failure. And now what does it propose to do? If there is one demand made by the people of this country more emphatically urged than another, if there is one purpose they have in view more conspicuously than another, it is the firm resolve that taxation shall be reduced in this country. If there is one institution or one agency of the Government more odious and offensive to the people than another it is the machinery of the internal-revenue system. That system has necessitated a swarm of office-holders, who hold the country like an army of occupation, 4,000 in number, having been clothed with powers of visitation, espionage, search, and seizure; and they have made this Government in that respect a terror to the people. A government founded in the affections of the governed should never be made a terror and a menace to its subjects. Nothing tends more than this to weaken the sentiments of patriotism and loyalty.

The public demand is for a reduction of taxation and the abolition of that offensive agency of the Government. What does this bill do? It surrenders the revenue of the Government, and retains the army of occupation with all its odious features, with all its powers of visitation and search, seizure and espionage, and does not reduce taxation to the consumer—the real tax-payer in this case.

Mr. JORDAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DUNN. I have not time to yield.

Mr. JORDAN. I merely wish to ask the gentleman in what way this bill surrenders any revenue of the Government?

Mr. DUNN. I will show that further on. Or I will do that right here. This bill provides for the extension of the bonded period of all whisky now in bond for two years longer than the law under which it went into bond. That slides all from the 1st of December last forward two years and makes a clean-cut chasm in the revenue of the Government, diminishing the receipts from that source $74,000,000 each year for two years, unless the holders voluntarily withdraw it and pay the tax, which we may be sure they will not do.

Mr. JORDAN rose.

Mr. DUNN. I can not yield further. The gentleman himself who reported the bill [Mr. MORRISON] admitted in his argument that it would lessen the receipts of the Government by $50,000,000; that is, that sum might be involved. I have here before me his speech in which he makes that admission.

Now what are the possibilities under that operation of the bill? What can be done? They say it is not class legislation. Whom does it benefit? The speculators in whisky alone. It is not for the benefit of the retail dealer. It is not for the benefit of the consumer. The man who drinks the whisky will pay the same old price that he did before or a higher price. It can easily be made to cover a great "corner," to be engineered by Congress and "carried" by the Government and fixed and made safe by law. The manipulators of this scheme will have it in their power to stop absolutely the sale of every gallon of whisky covered by its operation for two years. It we enact this law, the whole quantity that is bonded can be held as in the grip of a giant and not one gallon of that whisky put into the market; and they can dictate just such a price as they please for it to the retail dealers and consumers. The Government carries the margin and covers the job and the speculation, and all at the expense of the toiling tax-payers of the country.

Under the provisions of this bill a great conspiracy can be made against the retail dealer and against the consumers who buy whisky. It is worse than that. It is protection in its most odious and offensive form. And, Mr. Chairman, my heart saddened when I saw that noble trigemini of free trade and reform, Messrs. MORRISON, HURD, and BLACKBURN, bearing this thing in their arms into this House. In the midst of the great battle with the common enemy, in the midst of the great battle with the bad wing, as they term it, of their own party (the protectionist wing), with the very banner of revenue reform fluttering over their heads and the slogan of free trade upon their lips, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, the distinguished free-trader from Ohio, the distinguished champion of the rights of the people from Kentucky, came into this House bearing this last bastard offspring of protection in their arms. "How are the mighty fallen!"

I say, when I see the great leader of the other wing of our party standing out for "protective tariff," when I see these great champions leave the heads of the columns of the people that are moving for reform and become the advocates and champions of this other new-light class of protectionists and bring in a new invention of protection, my heart sinks within me, and I groan to relieve my burdened spirits and for the miseries that are in store for the people, who no longer seem to have a leader who will cut straight, who will "hew to the line and let the chips fall where they may."

"Cæsar had a party and Pompey had a party, but Rome had none." Alas, alas! shall this sad ejaculation be so soon uttered in this young and now happy and vigorous Republic?

What proof do I need to show that this is a measure of protection? Every gentleman who has argued the question has said, if you fail to pass this bill what will happen? The market will be glutted and the price of whisky will go down. How much will the retailer complain of that? How much will the consumer of whisky complain of that? How much will the scientist who uses alcohol complain of that? How much will the manufacturer who uses alcohol complain of that? Are we legislating here to keep up the price of commodities that the people consume? Are we as a "tariff-for-revenue" party to legislate to keep up the price of this article of such extensive consumption? It can hardly be classed as an "infant," for we read of it in all ages of the world, and while it may not be very steady, it is certainly "well upon its legs." This process of protection, it may be remarked, is a totally new discovery, and the whisky speculators can, and no doubt have, raised their flag over it. And they have, as we have seen, deceived the very elect and led them astray.

The people will groan in their hearts when they see all these things, and will ask one another, Can such things be? Is there nobody in favor of reducing taxation in all its forms? The distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] read us a long catalogue of places to which we could send this surplus money. Certainly we can find plenty of places to send it to. But the gentleman never suggested any reduction of taxation. That never seems to occur to any Republican. That is strictly against their main articles of faith.

My brethren of the Democratic party, we need not steal out this $75,000,000 and try to hide it behind us, and then go home and tell the people that we have reduced the revenues. Sir, they will find it out; they will see the crumbs on our fingers; they will detect the clumsy deception, and will condemn the men who are engaged in it, as they have already condemned all of you over on the other side there for not reducing taxation heretofore; and they will send men here who will find out how to reduce the revenues by reducing taxation. That is what they will do.

What will be the effect on the revenue supposing we carry out, as I think we ought to carry out, the programme of our own party, largely in the majority here? What is it? I may take somebody by surprise, but there is something in this you had better attend to. What do we propose? We propose by pending legislation, by a solemn compact entered into last night—and it has been published in the papers, so that I am not telling any secrets—we propose to reduce the revenues by the pending tariff bill $31,000,000; we propose to sweep away the tobacco tax, which will reduce the revenues $23,000,000 more; and we propose in this bill to give away, to loan out, to take out of the revenues, $75,000,000.

That is just what it amounts to. If you slide this tax along for two years as you propose by this bill, then you will make a chasm in the revenues of $75,000,000 for each of those two years. That will be the resulting effect of this bill. Then the general average decline from all other sources of revenue will be, say, $5,000,000. That will make in all $134,000,000. We then propose to pension the soldiers of the Mexican war, which will take $3,000,000 per annum more than has been estimated for as the expenditures of the next fiscal year, making in all $137,000,000 reduction.

What does the Secretary of the Treasury say we will have? He says that for the next fiscal year the estimated revenues from all sources will be $343,000,000; that the estimated expenditures, including the sinking fund, will be $283,000,000, leaving an estimated surplus of about $59,000,000. Now, if we go on and make these other reductions (and I want to call the attention of my brethren to this particularly)—if we make these reductions to the amount of $137,000,000, we will create an absolute deficiency of $78,000,000 by our programme.

My distinguished friend from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] said that this was not a loan. I did not say it was, but I was trying to fix up a little matter of book-keeping so that we could keep the Treasurer straight. When the Treasurer comes to credit the Government with interest received, I wanted to know on what account it would be entered on the books. The gentleman from Connecticut said that these parties did not owe the Government anything; that the Government did not lend them anything; that nothing was due the Government; but he was going to collect interest in advance on something.

Now, I accept his solution of it; but I would advise the Secretary of the Treasury just to give the Government credit for interest on money which it never loaned. How will that explain it? It will be about as intelligible as was Bill Arp's account against the man whom he had paid in advance for digging a well and who failed to dig it. He had to sue the well-digger to recover the money back. He stated the account in this way: "John Jones, Dr. to Bill Arp. To one well you never dug, $50." [Laughter.]

Such will be the effect on our revenues if our programme should be carried out, and we ought to do so; for it is a wise one and a wholesome one, and one which the country demands. If this Congress does not respond to it the people will send one here that will.

I want to call attention further to the reduction of the revenues proposed under this programme in connection with what has been done heretofore. The tariff bill of last year reduced the revenues about $12,500,000. The reduction in the internal-revenue and tobacco tax last year, it is estimated by the Internal Revenue Bureau, will reduce the revenue about $43,000,000. Now add the amount of reduction proposed by our programme, and we may lump it at $189,000,000 of reduction, in the face of an estimated surplus of only $59,000,000. And this wonderful result will be accomplished with but slight reduction of taxation.

But gentlemen say, "If you do not give this indulgence to these people what are you going to do with this money?" Let the Secretary of the Treasury answer that as he has done already. I will read his very satisfactory answer for the benefit of those who are so troubled about, not indeed taxation, but the surplus in the Treasury:

> It is perhaps enough to present that the payable debt of the Union can take up all surplus now existing or likely to arise for four years to come.

I hope gentlemen will accept that as an answer, showing how this money can be disposed of in a manner to suit the people a little better than some of the methods proposed here.

Mr. Chairman, it bodes no good to the States when we see a surplus of revenue in the Treasury setting in motion all these multifarious schemes from all corners of the country mining for this surplus revenue. They come from the east and the west. They tunnel from away out on the frontiers. All are running shafts for the surplus in the Treasury. It is a rich mine, that all want to work. It is a mine of corruption. It sets in motion every evil influence; and it bodes no good to the States when we set all these mischievous elements to work and tempt their proclivity to crime. It operates upon public servants as a temptation to extravagance; it is an incitement of bad men everywhere to corruption and wickedness. They come here with all sorts of "private enterprises for the public good," and they deceive whom they can not corrupt. The cry is, "There's millions in it!"

What has been the effect of the law heretofore passed granting an indulgence of this kind? Why, sir, in the volume which I have here—I have not time to read it now—I read the other day in the debates of the Senate when they were discussing the bill of 1882 a jeremiad delivered then by the distinguished Senator from Ohio, who was (strange as you may think it) pleading most piteously for relief for these suffering ones—a jeremiad which would have put old Jeremiah himself to the blush. They said—the bad newspaper-men said—that when the Senator delivered it a tear ran down his nose and congealed before it got to the end of it. [Laughter.] I do not say that; it was some bad newspaper-man who said it. He told over, in eloquence more touching, more pathetic, more melting than any we have heard here, that same old story of sorrow, distress, and oppression. The story we now hear is the same story revamped. It ought not to avail any more. It has been told too often—"it is the same old sixpence."

Why, sir, what has been the effect of this kind of legislation? The distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], like the able and ever-faithful pioneer that he is, blazed the way for members here to follow who intend to serve the people. He showed the effect of previous legislation of this kind, so that those who run may read. He marked out the pathway. He stated the whole case. He showed first that the disease was feigned and the medicine a deadly poison; and secondly, that the original law levying a tax upon whisky required that tax to be paid when it was put upon the market for consumption. This law offered great inducements to store whiskies in warehouses for a term of years in order to get the advantage of the increased value resulting from age, and, as was well said by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Governor LONG], "there accumulated also the opportunities, temptations, and incidents of a system of fraud" which the country remembers with humiliation and shame. This necessitated the legislation of 1868 by which the bonded period was limited to one year. Under that law the accumulation of whisky went on to such an extent that in 1878 earnest and piteous appeals were made to Congress to extend the limit.

It was said then, as it is now, that relief must be granted, and if not granted promptly panic, bankruptcy, and ruin would inevitably occur. It was then said, as now, that the desired extension of the limit to three years would give a breathing spell, as it were, that would enable them to work off the excess at remunerative prices and adjust and limit production to the demand. The arguments of to-day are but a reissue of the old arguments of that time. The result of that legislation was predicted by those who wisely opposed it and again shortly afterward by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. There had been an increase of 5,000,000 gallons in 1879 over that of 1878, and it appeared that there would probably be an increase of 13,000,000 gallons in 1880 over 1879, as stated by Mr. BLOUNT. Even so early as that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue said:

> The steady increase in the number and capacity of distilleries in operation suggests the probability of the continued enlargement of the stock on hand. It has occurred to me that this business was on the eve of being overdone, and that in the event of a recurrence of the agitation for a reduction of the tax the holders of these spirits will be in danger of loss.

Such was the warning of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue at that period.

And just in this connection the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] asks the pertinent question and furnishes the following significant and instructive answer:

> What was the condition of the whisky in the country at that time? Let me read a statement of the quantity of spirits in warehouses at the beginning of the fiscal year 1879, with the quantity produced, &c.

| | Gallons. | Gallons. |
|---|---|---|
| Quantity of spirits actually in warehouses beginning of fiscal year | | 14,088,773 |
| Quantity of spirits produced during fiscal year | | 71,892,621 |
| Total | | 85,981,394 |
| Quantity of spirits withdrawn, tax-paid, during fiscal year | 51,885,939 | |
| Quantity of spirits withdrawn for exportation during fiscal year | 14,837,581 | |
| Quantity of spirits withdrawn for scientific purposes, for use of the United States, for transfer to manufacturing warehouse, destroyed by fire, allowed for loss by leakage in warehouse, &c. | 45,404 | |
| Total | | 66,768,924 |
| Quantity of spirits remaining in warehouses at end of fiscal year | | 19,212,470 |

> It thus appears that at the end of that fiscal year there remained in the bonded warehouses, in round numbers, only 19,000,000 gallons. Under the operation of the three years' extension there remained in the bonded warehouses at the end of the next year 31,000,000 gallons. In 1881 the quantity remaining in bond had increased to 64,000,000 gallons; in 1882, 87,000,000 gallons; and in 1883 there remained in bonded warehouses 80,000,000 gallons.

It was also foreseen and foretold that applications would be made for further extensions. In 1882 it came, and was refused after a long and desperate struggle. The result was beneficial to the whisky manufacturing interest itself. It marked the commencement of a healthy reaction in the business. In 1879 they made 71,000,000 gallons; in 1880, 90,000,000 gallons; in 1881, 117,000,000 gallons; in 1882, 105,000,000; and in 1883, 74,000,000—more than the demands of consumption required. Production increased under the stimulus of further extensions of the bonded period, and promptly declined after the refusal to further extend it in 1882. It has been well remarked that these figures conclude the whole business aspect of the case.

If, as the gentleman from Illinois says, we have reduced the production to the real measure of the demand for consumption, should we disturb this adjustment?

Now, Mr. Chairman, who are these people who are asking this measure? I take their own showing. Here are dispatches sent here which I have gone through and tabulated. The petitioners for this measure embrace one governor, seventy-five bankers, seven grain-dealers, two commission merchants, three distillers, one chandler (I do not know what the candle-man has to do with this), one tanner (if he will stick to whisky it will tan his hide), one lumber-dealer, one glass manufacturer, and one melting company. Now, I am not going to say that the bankers are suspicious characters; but they are very speculating characters. They are wonderfully given to "corners" and "futures" and speculations and jobs. Ordinarily they have to carry their corners and their futures at their own expense. But if they can only get the Government to shoulder this for them they would have luscious times undoubtedly. It would be "richness" indeed. The stake is a splended one—indeed it is a "right royal" one—$150,000,000. Extension long enough to sell what is not covered by the bill at double price, and then would come the last grand act of the drama—the repeal of the internal-revenue laws and the release of all this vast unpaid sum.

Surely we could not have the heart to enforce collection after abolishing the tax.

Did these seventy-five bankers authorize the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] to deplore their condition before the House, and say that they are going to break if this bill does not pass? If they are in that condition the country ought to know it and Mr. Comptroller Knox ought to know it. But so far as I have been able to gather from their advertisements as to the state of their settlements when Comptroller Knox made his last inspection they were in a wonderfully wholesome and prosperous condition. They invite a continuation of deposits and business and say that they are able to carry it. The report of Comptroller Knox shows that the banking system of the country is in a wholesome condition; under no strain at all. The reserves have increased and the surplus has increased, and assets largely exceed liabilities. The predicted crash that was to have occurred last summer was not on time, and has not been heard of anywhere yet. Failures are actually diminishing in Illinois, Ohio, and Kentucky according to Bradstreet. It may be unthoughted, but it is true.

Now one point more. Gentlemen have elaborated the argument here that these innocent people have been wofully discriminated against. I need recur to that, after the able exposition of it by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], only to refresh the memory of the House. The law originally was that these distillers should have what the tobacco manufacturers and the malt-liquor manufacturers had, the privilege of paying when they sold the article. It has been shown under that indulgence the whole system became a nursery of corruption and a cesspool of fraud, into which whoever thrusts his arm will withdraw it leprous with crime and putrid with corruption.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HUBD] made the wonderful argument that Congress then put a penalty upon them for these crimes. This whole country believes those people escaped punishment. They are not on trial now. The Government, finding that policy failed, changed it, and required them to pay in one year. Then they came and asked another indulgence, and got the three-years period which is now the law.

No other interest in this country actually enjoys such privilege except that. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] has shown that under the law the importer of foreign goods pays at the end of one year, and if he takes two years longer, which the law allows him, for storage, he pays 10 per cent. additional for its remaining in store. But he pays the tax at the end of one year. The tobacco tax is paid within one year. The tax on malt liquor is all paid in one year.

The report of the committee itself shows this trade has suffered distress in common with the other trades and business interests of the country. We see that it is not the operation of the law at all. It is because of abuses, of mistakes, errors of judgment resulting from bad calculation, if not mischievous purpose, under the law. This House, this Congress has been steadily besieged by that element for indulgence from the beginning of the time when Congress put a tax upon them. They have always been here, and every scheme they ever produced yet when it was uncovered had at least a bad smell about it. [Laughter.] They are not an oppressed people.

I will read from the instructive remarks of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], from which it clearly appears that the allegation that the legislation of this country has been hostile towards this people is utterly unfounded. He says:

I desire to call attention to the following statement of the laws in relation to customs:

"Act August 30, 1842, section 12 (5 Statutes, 561): Duties to be paid in cash. On failure to pay goods to be placed in public stores and sold after sixty days by Government.

"Act August 6, 1846, section 1 (9 Statutes, 53), amends former act of 1842 by allowing goods to be entered and placed in bonded warehouses. If remaining beyond one year in warehouse without payment of duties to be sold by Government.

"Act March 3, 1849, section 5 (9 Statutes, 399), modifies former law by allowing goods to remain in warehouse an additional year for withdrawal for exportation (i. e., two years from date of importation).

"Act March 28, 1854, section 4 (10 Statutes, 270), allows goods to remain in warehouse three years either for consumption or exportation.

"Act March 14, 1866, sections 1 and 2 (14 Statutes, 8), allows goods in bond to remain in warehouse three years for consumption or exportation, but if withdrawn for consumption after one year from date of importation they shall pay an additional duty of 10 per cent. on the duties originally assessed.

"This law is reproduced in sections 2970 and 2971 Revised Statutes, and is the present law.

"Act August 5, 1861, section 5 (12 Statutes, 293), provides that goods must be withdrawn from warehouse within three months for consumption and within three years for exportation, with proviso that they may be withdrawn for consumption after three months and before expiration of two years on payment of duties and 25 per cent. thereof additional.

"Act July 14, 1862, section 21 (12 Statutes, that 559), provides goods must be withdrawn for consumption within one year, and within three years for exportation."

When the provision in reference to exportation was inserted in that legislation for what purpose was it done? In 1846, when there was the beginning of a liberal policy towards the importers, it was urged upon Congress that American merchants should have the privilege of bringing in foreign goods, not for sale in American markets, but with the view of making up mixed cargoes for exportation. It was alleged as a reason for and as an illustration of that policy that at that very time there was at Liverpool over two hundred millions in value of foreign goods brought in not for consumption but for re-exportation, brought in with a view to making up cargoes for re-exportation. It was not in the interest of any one in distress, but in the interest of a great public policy. As I understand it, the gentleman's proposition is not in the interest of any public policy except that general one, that general welfare which covers everything and which will relieve them from present distress. The gentleman, therefore, on the matter of exportation can furnish no reason to this House.

I have stated the principle upon which it was done as to foreign goods. Now, it is not the purpose of these gentlemen to export this whisky; they declare that they ask this relief because it is a case of pecuniary distress to themselves in the present emergency.

But let us look further. Goods imported may remain in the bonded warehouse without paying any charge for one year. Then they may remain two years more by the payment of 10 per cent. on the value of the goods. If the goods remain there twenty-four hours over the twelve months, this 10 per cent. must be paid. But in this case those interested in this legislation have already had or will have their liquors in bonded warehouses for three years without the payment of a nickel in the way of interest. Does the importer have any advantage in that respect? Let me read from the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who seems to think that these gentlemen have had a very especial advantage:

"The causes which in addition to the improvement of the time have led to this great increase in the production of distilled spirits are the amendments of the internal-revenue laws, which have secured"—

Have secured what?

"First, the increase in the bonded period from one year to three years."

That is identical with the privilege accorded to the importer in bringing in foreign goods.

"Second, the allowance for loss by leakage while in the warehouse."

This is an advantage which the distiller has over the importer.

"Third, the relief from the payment of interest on tax while in bonded warehouse."

For two years out of the three which the importer can leave his goods in the bonded warehouse he must pay 10 per cent. of the value of the duty on the goods. The distiller of whisky is not required under the present law to pay one nickel of interest, as I have said, while his goods remain in the bonded warehouse.

"Fourth. The allowance of leakage of spirits while in transportation for export or to manufacturer's warehouse."

I say that these are peculiar advantages to the distiller, when compared with the privileges allowed to the importer of foreign goods. Then as a matter of fact where is the peculiar hardship on the distiller? If at the end of three years the importer shall not pay his tax his goods are confiscated by the Government and sold.

It is said that the importer has the privilege of exportation. What does that amount to? For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, the value of imported goods amounted to $716,000,000, and the amount re-exported was only $17,000,000, and that proportion is pretty generally preserved.

The one thing remaining for Congress to do is to go to work like men and reduce taxation. That is what the people demand, reduction of the burdens of taxation. Lighten the burdens of taxation and in that way sweep away this excess of revenue. So long as we have it we will have a place to put it.

Mr. CALKINS. How would you reduce taxation?

Mr. DUNN. On the necessaries of life. I would not reduce it on whisky.

Mr. CALKINS. On sugar?

Mr. DUNN. Yes; I would reduce it on sugar. I would reduce it on wool and woolen goods. I would give the laboring classes cheaper clothing to wear, cheaper food to eat, cheaper implements of industry to work with and to toil with in the fields. I would abolish the laws which load the laboring classes up with burdens, and I would put those burdens on the luxuries of the wealthy, such as whisky and things of that sort. I would very largely increase the free-list.

Mr. CALKINS. How about tobacco?

Mr. DUNN. I am indifferent about that, but I am going to stand by the programme of my party. I will vote to repeal the tobacco tax. I would give the laboring people a cheaper chew of tobacco. I will do that. I would reduce the burdens of taxation all along the line. That is the demand, and if my voice could reach the great men, the leaders who mold and shape the policy of the nation, I would tell them to cease their wrangling with one another. I would tell them to lay down their arms, to put up their fratricidal swords, and bring the columns they are leading against the breastworks and fortifications of taxation, oppression, corruption, extravagance, profligacy, and open and audacious robbery of the Government. I would tell them to seize the battle-flags of their party and march on to the people's victory. I would tell them to listen to the command given last November, which rang out from the granite mountains of the East to the rocky-ribbed mountains of the far-distant West, that command for reform, for reduction of expenses, reduction of burdens of taxation, that command which still rings and reverberates across the continent.

That command was given by the people, and they intend that it shall be obeyed. Political parties may wrangle with each other; men may turn from the path of duty and rend and tear each other; but the people will march on, keeping in view steadily the great question of reform in this Government. They intend to have it in all things. They intend to have an expulsion of all bad men from high places. They intend to have the simple, honest, primitive Government which our fathers gave to us. They intend to preserve the vitality and the health of that tree of liberty which our fathers planted here for us, which they fertilized with their blood and watered with the sweat of patriots; and the man or the party who turns aside from that march or from that work of reform will be trampled under foot in the grand procession of the American people. They are in deadly earnest, and they intend to have this reform in our Government. If we do not give it to them they will send men here to take our places who will give it to them.

But, sir, I want to read in this connection what I had almost forgotten. I referred once before to that great journal the New York Herald, which did a really valuable service in exposing this measure. I will read this article upon the subject. It is wise and wholesome advice, and I commend it to gentlemen:

The bill—

That is the bonded-extension bill—

is unadvisable in every respect. It is contrary to the wishes of the people; there never was a measure before Congress that was so generally disapproved by the great mass of voters and tax-payers. It withholds taxes that already have been deferred so long as to give the whisky trade favors such as never were enjoyed by any other business in the United States, and it inspires the dealers with a fond hope that they may never have to pay the tax at all. It attaches suspicion to almost every legislator who has anything to do with it, for some men in the whisky business have talked plainly of what they have done for politics and what they still may do or refuse to do. It encourages overproduction; new distilleries are now being planned and built in anticipation of the passage of the bill.

Worst of all, it places the Government in the position of a partner in the whisky business; all the terms used and arguments offered start from the basis that the Government practically has a lot of money invested in whisky and ought to grant an extension, just as merchants sometimes do to unfortunate customers. So insolent a suggestion would never have been made by any other trade; but the whisky men have been so persistently coddled ever since their goods were first taxed that they seem to regard the Government as a sort of junior partner on sufferance. * * * The Government of the United States is not a whisky dealer, much less is it a whisky speculator.

Now here is something else in another newspaper. I read from the Cincinnati News-Journal of March 17, the eve of this discussion, sent here doubtless as a timely caution and a stern admonition to members of Congress, so that, being "forewarned they would be forearmed," and have their "calling and election sure:"

It is a curious fact that the friends of the whisky bill have found the greatest difficulty in getting votes from the members of States where they expected the strongest support, while from the States where prohibition is a strong element they are promised a larger number of votes than they had anticipated.

"In the Southwest," said General Megibben, of Kentucky, to-day, "we got a stronger support than we had anticipated. Take Ohio, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, and even prohibition Iowa, and the Democrats from these States are ready to vote solidly in support of our bill. It is in the South and Southwest that we are disappointed. We believed that we should have the strength of that section without asking. We find, however, that we were very much mistaken. Take Texas and Arkansas and Georgia, for instance; the members from those sections seem to be afraid to help us. They think that their support of the bill would endanger their standing at home in some local-option precinct, or something of that sort."

The general was speaking particularly in the present, and he was, therefore, asked if he still thought the bill would pass, to which he replied: "I think its chances are fair; if we can bring those people who ought to vote with us and those upon whom we have relied we ought to pass it, and if not we probably will not. If they fail us, however," he said, as a light gleamed in his eye, "if they fail us, however, a great many of them will sit at home when the next Congress convenes."

Warning significant to those who oppose the measure. That is the great terror to the member of Congress! Tell him that here is a great power applying for this great stake of $75,000,000; that its whole power shall be concentrated against any member who dares to vote against the measure! I trust, Mr. Chairman, and I believe that no member of this House so disregards the position that he occupies before the American people as to be induced by any such threats to cast a vote for this measure. I trust that the result of the vote on this question will show that nothing of the kind exists. I trust and I believe that when we shall have disposed of this measure the records will show that no member's position or vote on the measure will have been changed by such insolent threats. I sincerely trust the bill will be defeated, otherwise,

'Twill be recorded for a precedent;
And many an error, by the same example,
Will rush into the state.

Mr. HARDEMAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to ask if there is no way under the rules of this House by which we can get this bill to a vote, so that we can go on with the other regular business of the session? This bill has been fully discussed, and we ought to go to something else. I would like to know, therefore, if there is any power under the rules of this committee to justify us in stopping this debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that is hardly a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HARDEMAN. If I am in order, I move that the committee rise and report the bill back to the House, with the recommendation that it do not pass. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky has the floor.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. HARDEMAN. I move that we limit debate on this thing if we can not get a vote on it now.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not yield the floor for the gentleman's motion.

The motion that the committee rise was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having taken the chair, Mr. DORSHEIMER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5265) to extend the time for the payment of the tax on distilled spirits now in warehouse, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move that when this House next resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering this revenue bill to-morrow morning that general debate shall close at 3 o'clock.

I will state, sir, that according to the tally-list kept at the Speaker's desk the debate has not been fairly divided as to time, there having been five hours and forty-nine minutes in advocacy of the bill and seven hours and eleven minutes occupied by its opponents. I am willing, if it be the wish of the House, that the debate shall go on for an hour longer this afternoon. If so I will move, with the belief that the House desires to proceed this evening, I will move that the committee resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill, and pending that I move that on to-morrow there shall not be more than one hour on each side allowed before the general debate shall close.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. Finish the debate now.

Mr. HARDEMAN. If in order I move an amendment to that proposition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will first state the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky, which is that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the unfinished revenue bill, and pending that motion that on to-morrow when the House shall again go into committee on this bill all general debate on the bill shall be limited to two hours; one hour on each side.

Mr. BLACKBURN. In order that the House may see that I am endeavoring to be fair I will say that three members of the Committee on Ways and Means who have not yet been heard upon this bill are asking to be heard. It is very unusual, I believe, for the House to refuse to members of the committee the opportunity to be heard on an important measure after that opportunity has been so generously given to gentlemen on both sides who are not members of the committee.

Mr. HARDEMAN. I move to amend by striking out of the motion all that relates to the debate to-morrow and to provide that when the committee resumes its session to-day the general debate shall close in half an hour. The members of the committee have had their chance and have farmed out to a considerable extent their time; and I think the interest of the country demands that some other bills beside the whisky bill shall have discussion.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am moving that the House return into committee this afternoon for the purpose of affording a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, Mr. HEWITT, of New York, an opportunity to be heard to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia moves to amend so as to limit general debate when the House next goes into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to one half-hour.

Mr. WELLER. I move as an amendment to the amendment that gentlemen who have their names on the list, and who will be debarred from speaking if this motion carries, have permission to print their remarks.

The SPEAKER. That as an amendment is not in order. It is something which can be done only by unanimous consent.

Mr. REED. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if two hours more of debate would not be sufficient, so that we may take the vote to-night?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I think two hours more of debate would answer the purpose of the advocates of the measure, but I think it will not meet the demands of its opponents as shown by the list at the chairman's desk. My proposition is that there shall be two hours allowed for debate to-morrow exclusive of the time to be occupied by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT], who I propose shall be heard this afternoon.

Mr. RANDALL. If I understand the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky, it is that the House shall come to an understanding that we will vote on this bill to-morrow at 2 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. After two hours' debate to-morrow is what is proposed by the motion.

Mr. KEIFER. But after that the bill will have to be considered by paragraphs.

The SPEAKER. The motion is that general debate shall close two hours after it shall have been resumed to-morrow.

Mr. RANDALL. One hour of that time I believe the gentleman from Kentucky is to place under my control.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANDALL. I think I can get along with half an hour, and in that way we may abridge the time for debate to-morrow so as to make it an hour and a half. Of the time proposed to be given me by the courtesy of the gentleman from Kentucky I will take but half an hour, so as to accommodate the House. For myself I would be ready to vote now, but of course I see there are several gentlemen who must yet be heard.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I accept the modification of my motion suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky modifies his motion, so that it now is that general debate shall be closed after an hour and a half to morrow; and to that motion the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDEMAN] moves an amendment that general debate——

Mr. HARDEMAN. That general debate close at 5 o'clock this afternoon, it being now 35 minutes past 3 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 74, noes 79.

Mr. HARDEMAN. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HARDEMAN and Mr. BLACKBURN were appointed.

Before the tellers made a report,

Mr. HARDEMAN withdrew the demand for further count.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The motion that general debate shall close after one hour and a half of debate in the Committee of the Whole to-morrow was agreed to.

The motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. DORSHEIMER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all general debate on the pending bill shall close after one hour and a half of debate in Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. BELFORD. How is that time to be divided?

The CHAIRMAN. That order takes effect to-morrow morning. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] is recognized.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Mr. Chairman, the bill under discussion is a revenue measure. Any mode of discussing a revenue measure which does not refer itself to economic principles is out of place. All appeals to sentiment, to passion, to emotion, are a mistake. In the discussion of this bill thus far, with a few exceptions, it has been advocated on the ground of charity on the one side and opposed on the ground of morality on the other side. But taxation looks not to charity or morality. It looks to certain economic principles which have been settled by the experience of mankind and are written on the pages of the history of the human race. Cold and calculating are the principles which the painful experience of humanity has thus evolved. Taxation can only fall upon accumulated capital, either that which is invested or that which is active in business, upon production, or upon consumption. There is no other point upon which the strong arm of the law may impose the burdens of taxation. And this principle has divided itself among mankind on a broad highway.

PRINCIPLES OF TAXATION.

First, all nations are agreed that so far as practicable taxation shall be made to fall upon accumulated capital and not upon active capital; not upon capital which is devoted to the conduct of business. Hence in the most enlightened nation on the subject of taxation that the world has ever seen the tax is made to fall upon the fruits, the income of accumulated property as far as possible. Beyond that the line of division of taxation between production and consumption is marked.

In the original history of government taxation fell generally upon production, because it was the easiest thing to reach, and hence arose that remarkable civilization of the Middle Ages in which the guilds tried to protect themselves from the exactions of arbitrary government levying its contribution upon their products. At the present day not a single enlightened nation, not a single commercial nation, proposes or imposes taxation upon the work of production except the United States.

Taxation upon production, however, still survives. It is the characteristic of the Oriental system of government. I have recently passed over that broad field and seen the blighting effects of taxation imposed upon production. Industrial death, moral stupor, decay, hopeless energies buried in the common grave created by a false system of taxation! The whole of the western shores of Asia and of the southern shores of Europe, now dominated by the Turkish Empire, is a monument to the folly of attempting to impose taxation upon production.

In this country, strange to say, enlightened by common schools, by colleges in every State and high schools in every county, with schools of political science and political economy flourishing everywhere, the cardinal principle of taxation which survives to-day is taxation upon production. When taxation is imposed upon the materials upon which human labor exerts itself, then it is a direct tax and imposition upon the work of production. Hence, in England, in France, in Germany, in Italy, in every country that holds a conspicuous place in the progress of modern civilization, raw materials are admitted as free as the air which the people breathe. But here they are met by obstructions the moment they come within the marine league—within the sight of this land of free thought and free government.

Until the system of taxation of this Government shall conform itself to the fundamental principle that taxation shall not impinge upon production, you will have what is now going on—stagnation, depression, suffering, want, lack of employment, disorders, riots, destruction of property, and, I am sorry to say, a shattering of the political organization which heretofore has been the pride of those who love freedom and the home of those who flee from oppression.

This bill is a step in the right direction, but it is not the right thing; it does not go far enough, it does not touch the heart of the question. It is the entering wedge which is going to bring us face to face with the question whether we shall continue to tax raw material or whether we shall allow any taxes to continue which restrict and interfere with the work of production in this country. It is for that reason I shall vote for this bill.

TAXATION FOR MORALITY.

It has been advocated here on the ground that the producers of whisky are great tax-payers, that they are now in distress and ought to have relief. To me that argument amounts to nothing. I go with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] in all that he said so eloquently yesterday as to the impropriety of this Government stepping in to the relief of any business, wherever carried on or in whatever direction. But on the other hand I do not go with that gentleman when he tells you that the granting of this relief will let loose upon this country a flood of whisky which will demoralize the population and be followed by wreck and ruin. Revenue taxation has nothing to do with morality or charity. The Constitution under which I have been brought up and have sworn to obey declares that taxation is for revenue and for revenue only. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But we have had a school in this country which has been dominant, the members of which believe in taxation for protection; and we have had taxation for protection until the people of this country have been differentiated into two classes, the very rich and the very poor. Now that this system is breaking down, aye, when the light is penetrating into the State of Massachusetts, which has been the home of protection, but from which we now get the strongest advocacy of the doctrine of free raw material, it is necessary that the members of that school who have exhausted all the possibilities of taxation for protection shall invent a new gospel. And it was announced here yesterday—taxation for morality. I suppose the gentleman would prefer me to say taxation for revenue with incidental morality. [Laughter.]

That idea is worthy of the party of great moral ideas. If you can support this Government or any government upon the vices of its people, if you can devise a revenue system which will compel those who depart from the ways of virtue to pay the expenses of the Government, then you will produce a new development truly admirable and worthy to be welcomed as the beginning of the millennium. Instead of dividing this country into the very rich and the very poor, you will divide it into the very good and the very bad, and the bad men will be made to pay all the expenses of the good men. Then, having founded your Government on the great basis of human depravity, you may economize to your heart's content, for you will want no more churches and no more colleges, but taxation for morality will be the panacea for all our woes. [Laughter.]

I have said that taxation has nothing to do with moral questions. It is just as legitimate to produce whisky, so far as taxation is concerned, as it is to produce pig-iron. In the eye of the law both industries are equally reputable and equally valuable to the community. As a pig-iron maker, knowing its vast uses, I am at a loss to-day to say whether the production of iron, or the production of alcohol, is more useful to the human race. Yet if any man to-day were to propose to impose a tax upon the manufacture of pig-iron he would be hooted out of this House, as he ought to be.

This is either a legitimate industry or it is not. If it is not a legitimate business, then it ought to be stopped; there can be no compromise. But if it ought to be stopped on moral grounds, it does not belong to the National Federal Government to prohibit it. That is a matter of police regulation which is reserved to the States. Let them deal with moral questions; we here have nothing to do with them. Having nothing to do with the moral question, and having, as I believe, satisfied you, or at least satisfied myself, that no tax ought to be imposed upon production in any lawful industry, then there is but one logical conclusion; that is, that this tax ought to be abolished altogether, because such a tax violates a fundamental economic principle.

ALCOHOL A RAW MATERIAL.

The first step, as the gentleman from Massachusetts properly said yesterday, toward its abolition is the passage of this bill; and I shall vote for it, not only because it is legitimate to grant an extension of credit, but because I think it will bring about the abolition of this tax altogether. I do not know or care whether these taxes, if extended under this bill, will ever be paid. I vote for this bill on the broad proposition that it will be the first honest step toward the doctrine of free raw material, which in my judgment is the vital question of this age and this generation in the industrial development of this country.

Now gentlemen may be under some misapprehension as to the nature of the production of alcohol and its uses. I observe that alcohol has been dealt with here mostly on the ground of being a beverage, and a bad beverage at that. No gentleman here has brought to the attention of the House and the country the vast uses of this commodity in the arts. I myself have been profoundly astonished at the investigations I have had to make; and you will be, Mr. Chairman, when I tell you that I am satisfied that one-half of the entire alcohol which is produced in this country is to-day, notwithstanding the drawback of an enormous excise duty, used in the arts, and not more than half is consumed as a beverage.

I find that the Secretary of the Treasury is in error in this particular, and I have only been able to get at the facts in regard to it from a most careful and elaborate investigation which has been made by Dr. E. R. Squibb, of Brooklyn, the best known manufacturing chemist in this country and the most eminent authority in his line in the world. Dr. Squibb has sent me a communication in which he makes the following statement:

If the finances of the nation will admit it, the tax—

Meaning the tax on distilled spirits—

should be abolished; for it never did the least good for the morals or the ebriety of the nation. It was simply a war measure to raise revenue from an artificial substance, of which probably two-thirds of the total production was then used as a luxury, which could easily be dispensed with if the consumer desired to avoid the tax. Now, with twenty years' progress of the arts and industries of the nation, the production has been very largely increased; and the proportion used in the arts and industries has also increased so largely, even despite the enormous tax, that in all probability it has reached one-half the total production. Hence the present situation seems to be that in order to reach and tax one-half the production of an enormous industry the other half is taxed to the enormous extent of nearly six times its original value; and this enormous tax not only embarrasses and retards the progress of thousands of industries, but renders hundreds of other industries which might be started impossible.

As an example of how the alcohol tax bears upon one large class of industries, take the instance of ether. It can be made only from alcohol. It is almost as important a solvent in the arts and manufactures as alcohol is, but for a different set of substances and a different set of uses—as different from alcohol in its uses as alcohol is from water, and with as many and as important advantages over alcohol. With the present tax on alcohol it costs here now, say, about 60 cents a pound when of a quality adapted to the arts and manufactures. This cost is prohibitory to all but a few finer uses, and so enhanced the cost of these few products that in turn their uses are hindered and restricted.

Contrast this with the condition of this same interest in countries where manufacturing alcohol is free from tax. Instead of $2.20 per gallon, alcohol costs, as it did here before the tax, 36 to 40 cents per gallon; and ether, as one of its products, instead of 60 cents per pound, costs 12 to 15 cents. Under these circumstances it is not difficult to understand the multitude of new uses in the industrial arts that are annually developed under the stimulus of cheap solvents which would otherwise remain undeveloped, or be developed at such higher and obstructive cost as would limit the use. In this country, with its greater inventive genius and its constant greater strain for progress in the arts and manufactures, the greater advantages of having free alcohol can easily be seen.

Instead of the combinations of alcohol-makers to restrict the production to a fraction of their capacity in order to maintain prices, and instead of the bonded warehouses crowded with spirits and the clamor for lengthened time, and instead of the limited and restricted uses, there would, in a year or two, be again the former activity in this interest with all the advantages and improvements of the past twenty years to stimulate it, with the result of still cheaper and better alcohol than before the tax. With the vast expanse of land for the cheap production of corn, and the enormous distilleries for its conversion into spirits and cattle food, this country could, and probably would, make alcohol and its products and educts so well and so cheaply as to supply a large part of the world, as it does with the parallel industry of grain and flour.

The larger the scale upon which corn is grown the more economical and more profitable the cultivation, and thus the benefit of free alcohol would reach the farmer. The larger the scale upon which alcohol is made the more economical and the more profitable that industry becomes, and thus that industry is benefited and cheaper and better alcohol supplied. Then the more alcohol made the more cattle food produced and the more cattle fed upon the residue, and the more meat and leather economically supplied, so that it is very easily seen how very far-reaching this alcohol tax is upon the economies of the nation, and at what expense the revenue from it is raised. If the revenue costs more than it is worth, it is not a political economy, and will doubtless be abandoned or be substituted from other sources.

The varied uses of alcohol are beyond any estimate. I find it in the household, in the surgery; I find it in the photographer's shop and among the artists; I find it in every kind of manufacture with which I have anything to do or of which I have any knowledge. I find it to be the universal solvent by which all substances are transferred from one form to another; and I find this vehicle taxed as if it were on a turnpike road with a toll-gate every half-mile. Yet we are expected to make progress in the innumerable arts dependent upon the use of alcohol as a vehicle.

Mr. Chairman, alcohol being, as I believe it to be to-day, a primary if not the leading raw material on which modern chemical industry rests, should be the first to be made free; and I announce now that from this time out, with my voice and my vote, I shall support every bill that proposes to free alcohol; and I shall not cease to work in that direction until the total abolition of this tax is accomplished.

Mr. HISCOCK rose.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. My colleague will excuse me just now; I will yield to him in a few moments.

METHYLATION OF ALCOHOL.

But, Mr. Chairman, I shall be told that this end can be reached by the methylation of alcohol—that after the addition of methyl to the alcohol it can be made free for use in the arts. I was of that opinion myself. I introduced a bill based upon that idea, as did also my friend from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS], which is under consideration by a subcommittee of the Committee on Ways and Means, on which I am serving with my colleague [Mr. HISCOCK] who I suppose was about to interrupt me on this point. We have been engaged in the preparation of a bill for the methylation of spirits in order that they might be got free of duty for use in the arts. But, to my surprise and regret, I find that methylation of spirits is a total failure; and as my authority for this I quote again Dr. Squibb, whose statement, with the permission of the House, I will incorporate in my remarks:

The only form of relieving the arts and manufactures from this spirit tax, which has thus far reached the form of a proposed law, is a bill introduced into the House of Representatives and referred, which proposes to exempt from duty any spirit to which a definite percentage of methyl alcohol has been added, leaving the present law and all its appliances still in force for all clean spirit. The theory upon which this proposed law is based is simply that by adding a certain amount of methyl alcohol or wood spirit to ordinary spirit or alcohol it is rendered so disagreeable to the taste that it can not be drunk or be used in beverages, but that such addition does not prevent its being used for manufacturing and industrial purposes. Hence that alcohol or spirit for industrial purposes will be freed from tax, while that which alone can be used for drinking will still pay the tax.

Supposing this plan to be entirely effective, as designed, and supposing the proportion of alcohol drunk be one-half or even two-thirds of the total production, the whole machinery and expense of the present law would be required to yield one-half or two-thirds the revenue it now does; for the same or even larger and more expensive appliances would be required to prevent evasion and revenue fraud.

But there are other and more serious objections. The proposed law proceeds on the theory that this methyl alcohol once added to the clean spirit permanently and irrecoverably spoils it for drinking purposes. This is a great fallacy that should be clearly recognized at the start, for the methyl alcohol can be taken out with comparative ease, and the proposed law acknowledges this by forbidding its being taken out, and providing a penalty against taking it out. To free this methylated spirit from the methyl and clean it so as to be used as a drink is neither a difficult nor an expensive process, and this cleaning would be very sure to be done in more ways than one and in ways that would render detection almost impossible.

If the methyl alcohol itself be pure and clean its taste and odor in the spirit would not be objectionable to a large class of spirit drinkers, and in some grades of spirit it would not always be easy to tell whether it was present in the required proportion or not, and very simple processes—short of the more complete one of distillation—would be applied that would so far clean the spirit as to render it acceptable to a large majority of spirit drinkers. Thus with the utmost vigilance and the most perfect detective system the law would, beyond doubt, be seriously evaded and the revenue defrauded.

And next as to the relief afforded to the arts and manufactures. There is probably not a single use to which alcohol is put that would not be more or less obstructed and hurt by the presence of the methyl—just as every adulterated substance is injured by the adulteration—while in a very large number it would be more objectionable than in drink; and for a still larger number of the better and more important uses methylated spirit could not be used at all. In all such its use would be prohibited quite as surely as for drinking purposes, and hence this larger and better class of uses would not be relieved by the plan, but would have to use taxed spirits, or else, in common with the drinking interest, unlawfully take the methyl out.

Doubtless many manufacturers would buy the methylated spirit, and at an expense not exceeding 2 or 3 cents a gallon would clean it for their own purposes, taking the risk of detection and the penalty, and thus be relieved of the tax, and yet get clean, good alcohol cheaply. With a not uncommon disregard for law and indifference to crime, and with sufficient cunning and care, such practices could be easily carried on to any extent, and so long as the cleaned spirit was used strictly for arts and manufactures it would be argued that the intent of the law would be fulfilled and no harm done. But as it would be quite impossible to confine such clean spirit to lawful uses, such practices could not be permitted if discovery of them was possible.

In short, the general effect would be that the honest manufacturer, who respected and obeyed the law, would not be relieved from the tax, because he could not properly use methylated spirit, while the unscrupulous one, and all the rogues uncaught, would be relieved. The business of the honest man would suffer, and his profits be small, because obliged to compete with the dishonest one, whose profits would be very large, thus offering a direct premium for crime.

Thus the law would, in practice, not relieve those whom it was intended to relieve, but would benefit only the dishonest of the class which is now so seriously embarrassed by the tax.

Again, it is not conducive of true economy and fair dealing to attempt by law to damage the purity of or to spoil or defile any substance for any purpose, and all such attempts must lead to loose principles of action and to various forms of fraud.

Methylated spirit would be used instead of clean spirit wherever its use could be concealed, even though quite unfit for such uses, as, for example, in medicines. Alcohol, as a solvent and vehicle, is of extreme importance in making medicinal preparations, and many thousands of gallons are annually used for such purposes. As methylated spirit would be quite unfit for such uses this industry would not be relieved at all, but would be much damaged by the clandestine use of the adulterated instead of clean spirit.

Good ether could not be made from methylated spirit unless the law be first broken by cleaning the spirit, neither could good chloroform be made from it, and therefore these industries would not be relieved, but would be damaged by offering temptation to the unscrupulous either to break the law by cleaning their spirit or to make impure and debased products.

This statement is absolutely conclusive to the effect that no methylation of spirits can begin to reach the difficulties of the situation. I am therefore compelled reluctantly to abandon any idea that this great result for which I aim can be accomplished by that process. The withdrawal of pure spirits in bond for use in the arts is also impracticable, because it will lead to endless frauds on the revenue unless a detective should follow each barrel. And then quis custodiet ipsos custodes?

TOBACCO TAXES.

Just here let me make another remark. In debate here to-day reference has been made to a resolution which proposes to abolish the taxes upon tobacco and also certain taxes upon spirits distilled from fruits. I am sorry that this action has been taken. I regret it. It is a step in the wrong direction. Tobacco is not one of the raw materials of industry; it is a luxury pure and simple, and when it is proposed to embarrass the progress of true revenue reform, which is the freeing of raw materials from duty, by the introduction of a provision which will make it impossible to remove the tax from alcohol, I regret it, although I may be compelled to vote for it in order to bring about the reduction of revenue, for I hold it to be the duty of this Congress to bring down revenue in every practicable mode. But I prefer to bring it down in a method which is in the line of revenue reform, which is in the line of removing obstacles from the growth and progress of industry; but if I can not accomplish the reduction of the revenue in the best way, I will take it in any other way which is open for me. But I say the action which has been referred to is in my judgment in the wrong direction, and that what we should do is to keep in force the duty upon tobacco and repeal the taxes upon alcohol until we thus compel a revision of the tariff upon the fundamental basis of free raw materials.

Mr. BELFORD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Yes, sir.

WHAT THE FARMERS WANT.

Mr. BELFORD. What is the difference, so far as it affects raw materials, between corn and tobacco? They are both products of the soil. Will my distinguished friend point out for the edification of the House the distinction which separates one from the other?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I will with pleasure, but briefly. Distilled spirits is one of the primary elements of manufacture; tobacco is not. I want to have manufactures grow. They cannot grow if impeded by obstructions as they are now. They have reached their limits. In the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee every great manufacturing interest came and told us they were capable of supplying more goods than they could sell; that the market was overstocked; that the capacity for production had outrun consumption.

There is but one mode by which manufactures can be extended. And here comes in the interest of the farmer. No legislation of this House should be thought of for a moment that can not be proved to be for the benefit of the farmer, for the farmers constitute 50 per cent. of the population of this country. Whatever propositions you make must be for the benefit of the farmers; and they will not go through unless the farmer can see they are for his benefit.

Now, how can the farmer be benefited? What does he want? He wants to sell his products at a higher price. How is he going to sell his products at a higher price as the grain trade stands to-day? The markets of Europe are overcrowded with food products; and more than that, the governments of Europe are averse to allowing our food products to come in. To-day the farmer is met at Liverpool and London by the food products of India. And that competition, so far from being less, is going to increase. Therefore, the farmer has reached the limit of the demand for his products in foreign lands.

Where, then, is he to find his market for them? He must find his market at home. And how is he going to get it at home? Why, only by one method: manufactures must be fostered and grow and not be diminished.

Now comes the question, how can you make manufactures grow? How can you enlarge their area? You have walled them in by the tariff so that there is no outlet for them in other lands.

In order to widen the market you must cheapen cost. How can you cheapen the cost of manufactures? In only one of three ways. The cost of manufactures consists in capital, labor, and materials.

Can you cheapen capital? To-day capital is cheaper in the United States than in any other country in the world.

Can you cheapen labor? Where is the man who is going to run next fall for Congress who will get up here and say he will advocate any policy which will reduce the wages of labor?

Then you are brought down by the very necessities of the case to cheapen raw materials. Now, how can you cheapen raw materials? Only by removing the duties which press upon them. And when you have taken the duties off raw materials you have protected the manufacturer, because he can produce his wares cheaper; you have protected the laborer, because the necessity for reducing his wages, which otherwise would exist, is avoided; and you have protected the farmer, who is the great consumer, by reduction in the cost of his supplies. That is the reason why you are driven to the policy of free raw materials upon which all other enlightened nations have long since planted their industries.

Another reason why I want to see the whisky tax abolished, in addition to the general principle I have laid down that no tax should be allowed to impinge any production whatever, is that it will so reduce the revenue as to compel a revision of the tariff upon the fundamental basis of free raw material.

FREE RAW MATERIALS.

Mr. DINGLEY. Let me ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. In one moment. The question will be asked whether it is possible to so frame a tariff, with the whisky tax abolished, as to give this country adequate revenue to meet current expenses, pay the interest on the public debt, and keep up the sinking fund, which I wish to preserve inviolable. I say, yes. It is far easier, Mr. Chairman, to increase revenue from customs than it is to reduce it, and the embarrassment we have had in the Committee on Ways and Means has been to find methods of reduction and not methods of increase.

But what I fear, in regard to the bill reported from the Committee on Ways and Means, is it may be delusive in that particular, and so far from being a measure of reduction of revenue it may turn out to be a measure for increase of revenue. I do not say that it will be so. I hope that it will not; but if the free-list is made larger, if it is extended, then it is certain that the revenue will be reduced; but it is only by enlarging the free-list that we can be sure of any such result.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, what I want, and I am frank to say it, is a larger free-list. You ask me what I would have upon that list. Coal, salt, and lumber we have already reported. Well, what else; will you go further than that? Yes, sir, I answer. Every ore of metal, including the iron ores which I mine myself and do not buy; and the ores of copper, iron, lead, and zinc. Well, would you go further? Yes; take the duties off of jute, sisal grass, manila, and other articles that enter into the manufacture of cordage, in order that we may do some thing for the revival of our depressed mercantile marine. Take the duties off of all of them.

What will I do with wool? I have no doubt myself that the removal of the duty on wool of all kinds and grades would be the wisest measure we could adopt for the general prosperity of the country. But I am met by gentlemen on my own side as well as on the other who do not agree with me, and all measures brought here must be so brought in as to get a majority, or else they can not pass. [Derisive laughter on the Republican side.] I do not know what you mean by jeers; but let me say to you, gentlemen, as I am in the habit of talking frankly, that I am in favor of the abolition of the duty on wool (if we have votes enough to do it), but if we have not votes enough to pass a bill for the repeal or modification of that duty we will give it up; we will yield the point, but only in order to abolish the duty on other articles where it should be abolished. And I will go still further. I will go back, if necessary, and put wool where it was before you touched it, in order to force you to vote upon a bill which puts other things upon the free-list that ought to be there. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. REED. Let me ask a question now.

NECESSITY FOR HARMONIOUS ACTION.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. No; I must decline to yield for any question.

In other words, all politics and all legislation is the result of the concurrence or compromise of opinion. I can not expect to have gentlemen follow me where I want to go. I must go far enough in their direction to get them to go with me to produce further and practical results. It is for this reason that parties exist and that we stand divided—you upon one side and we upon the other. But you vote every time solidly together, while we do not. [Derisive laughter on the Republican side.]

I say to my fellow-Democrats, now and here, that in order to secure a measure of revenue reform that begins right, takes the first step toward real reform, I will swallow any quantity of disagreeable medicine; and I say to this Democratic party here to-day that unless they are prepared to go together as a party they had better disband.

Mr. REED. This is not a caucus.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I say in the mean time it is our duty to try to come together on a common ground, and for my part I will sacrifice as much as any other man will sacrifice to get there. But that common ground, Mr. Chairman, ought to be a common ground of free raw materials. Upon that common ground we can all stand. We can unite the industries of the people in our favor. On that ground we shall have the farmer, the manufacturer, and the laborer, because we have produced harmony between the three great branches of American industry.

Mr. Chairman, gentlemen on the other side doubtless are disposed, and will be disposed, to criticise what I have said to-day as a departure in some respects from principle for the sake of policy. Let them not deceive themselves. I know of only one possible policy for this country in order to get out of its present difficulties, and that is the removal of the restrictions upon its manufactures. I know I can not achieve that result all at once; I know that I ought not to try to get it all at once; but I want to begin at the bottom; I want to begin at the beginning; and as I have said in the committee, and as I have said at other times, I do not believe this horizontal cut is the best method of arriving at what we want or of reaching that end. [Applause.]

I would be false to my convictions, I would be false to my experience in business, and I would be false to my own training if I took any such view of the question. But I do say that I would rather do that and vote for that bill, rather than fail to give proof to the people of this country that this Democratic party is in dead earnest when it says it will reduce taxation. [Loud and prolonged applause.]

Mr. BRUMM. It is, in earnest, dead! [Laughter.]

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. It may be dead but I do not see any evidence of death. It has been said a good many times that it was dead; but if it is dead, I can only say that it is one of the liveliest corpses that the world has ever seen, and it is a corpse that will still go to the Republican funeral. [Laughter and applause.] Now my friend from Maine, who is a good friend of mine, may be the driver of that hearse. If so, I shall go with a great deal more satisfaction in his company. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. I am afraid you won't be there. You won't be able to keep up with the procession any more than you do to-day. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. No; I do not believe that we will be able to keep up with the procession. I think it will travel at a 2.40 rate to the tomb; too fast for the Democratic crowd to follow it. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX, of New York. It would be dead raw material.

Mr. REED. Dead material out of which we will manufacture another Republican victory. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I should be sorry to be the raw material for the gentleman from Maine, but he must have devoured a great many innocent Democrats before he thought of devouring me. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. REED. I have; not very innocent, though.

Mr. TALBOTT. The Republican party always did manufacture their victories. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I have occupied the time of the committee at much greater length than I intended. And I will acknowledge to my friends on the other side who seem to be interested that I have traveled over some ground that I had not intended to occupy. Nevertheless I have tried to get before this committee and before the country one fundamental principle—the absolute necessity of starting in the race of manufactures fairly with other nations. They start with free materials and we start with taxed materials. There is no chance for us. We are dead-weighted at the outset. We are beaten before we begin to make the race. And yet there is all the world waiting for us—markets everywhere.

PROPOSED TARIFF LEGISLATION.

Mr. MORRISON. May I ask my colleague on the committee if our chief competitor starts with free alcohol?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. For the arts it does. And I believe if we had free alcohol for the arts, free from methylation, we would drive our chief competitor out of every market in the world in the production of every article into which alcohol enters. I believe that the profits of the business we shall achieve from free alcohol will far exceed any amount of revenue that has ever been collected from it. Gentlemen, I am not speaking wildly. I will append this communication of Dr. Squibb to my remarks. I invite you all to read it with great care. The area is absolutely unlimited. And it is that consideration which has brought me against my own wishes to the conclusion that distilled spirits should be made absolutely free.

Therefore, if I had the making of a tariff in my own hands to-day I have no hesitation in saying what I would do. I would abolish the whisky tax, but preserve the tobacco tax temporarily. I would take the duty off all these raw materials, and while the good effects of that relief were going into operation I would not touch another duty upon the tariff act, except to correct manifest blunders.

That is what I would do. But gentlemen must not misunderstand me. These duties are too high; they must come down. They ought to be brought down before the next revival of business occurs, because if they are not, then these enormous duties will be put into the profits, and the consumers of this country will be robbed for the benefit of a few overgrown manufacturers, as they were in the case of Bessemer steel rails and as they have been in the case of other branches of business of which I am personally cognizant. Therefore, these duties ought to be got out of the way. But I would not take them out of the way at present. I would leave them there to get the beneficial effect of the removal of these duties on raw materials and trust to the inevitable law of competition to bring down the price of manufactures to the lowest limits of cost, which is certain to be the case when the capacity for production exceeds the consumption. This is our present condition, and is likely to be our condition for a long time to come.

One of these duties, one of the most important, has not been referred to; it does not appear in the tariff bill. I refer to the duty on tin plates, not a pound of which is made in the United States; and there is not a person to be affected by the repeal of that duty. Five millions of dollars or nearly so are now collected on tin plates. They are used in the kitchen; they are used for canning, for export, for roofs, and in every branch of business. Everybody everywhere is a consumer of tin plate. To repeal this duty would be a great and direct relief to the farmers. I would put tin plates on the free-list. And I would transfer to the free-list, as rapidly as possible, everything I could discover that I could put there without destroying some existing branch of business. I would go slowly, and let the people of the country, who are not educated up to the doctrine I believe in and advocate, see the good effects of it. I would follow the people with legislation and not attempt to go in advance of their judgment and their views. [Applause.]

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN].

Mr. BLACKBURN. How much time has the gentleman from New York left?

The CHAIRMAN. Twelve minutes.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CALDWELL] five minutes.

Mr. BELFORD. I hope the gentleman will give us a show on this side of the House.

Mr. BLACKBURN. According to the list kept at the Chairman's desk there have been occupied on the other side of the House one hour and fifty minutes more than on this side. The twelve minutes which remain of the time of the gentleman from New York I propose to divide between the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CALDWELL] and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN] is recognized.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Mr. Chairman, I have been much gratified in listening to the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT]. He says he does not desire to have a tax imposed upon immorality. I do; for I am sure that the Democratic party will then bear at least its full share of the burdens of taxation.

But what has particularly pleased me in the gentleman's remarks has been their frankness. Unlike others who have advocated this bill and who claim that its opponents favor the repeal of the whisky tax, he states that he supports the bill as a preliminary step to repeal. He desires that the whisky tax shall be abolished, and with that end in view as his ultimate object he urges the passage of this bill. This is a logical position to occupy. I believe that if this bill becomes a law it will be found to have been but the entering-wedge to the repeal of all law imposing taxes upon whisky. It extends the time of the payment of about $70,000,000 due from the distillers and whisky owners to the Government two years. If this is done the whisky interest, relieved of its present embarrassment and reassured by the action of Congress, will continue to increase its surplus. The seventy millions will become one hundred millions. Thus re-enforced, and with so much more at stake, it will come to Congress demanding repeal where it now asks only extension of time, and perhaps require a remission of taxes already due. The gentleman from New York says he does not care if these taxes are never paid. He more than intimates that he does not think they will be. I incline to believe that his intimation will become a correct prediction if this bill shall become a law.

I desire to say to the gentleman from Kentucky, who declared that the opponents of this bill were friends to the repeal of the whisky tax and that perhaps I was one of them, that I will never vote for the repeal of that tax so long as the Government has to raise a revenue to pay its debts and meet its expenditures. I say this not as a temperance man. It is not necessary to say it as such. I would continue this tax as a wise and patriotic method of raising revenue, for if any method of raising a revenue is better than all others it is that which makes the burden of taxation bear most lightly upon the people. Such certainly is the whisky tax. It is levied upon a harmful luxury. It is voluntarily paid. No man need bear its burden. It touches not any necessity of life that goes in over the threshold of the poor or enters by the portals of the rich. He alone pays it who chooses to do so, and it is levied upon that which is the producer of harm.

I believe that to repeal this tax would be worse than throwing the money it produces into the sea, for I am satisfied that its restrictive power upon the sale of intoxicants saves directly and indirectly more to the people than the whole value of the tax. The gentleman from Pennsylvania would abolish the entire internal-revenue tax. He calls it infernal revenue. Why infernal? Is it because it produces a great income to the Government without increasing the price of any necessity of life? He tells us that it cost $10,000,000 annually to collect it; but it puts more than a hundred millions annually in the national Treasury. He further says that the enforcement of this law is resisted, and that it is necessary to make raids upon its violators to collect the revenue. This is true only in certain sections of the country where lawless communities diregard all Federal laws that are displeasing to them. In these same communities the election laws are resisted with more force and determination and with greater success than the revenue laws. Would the gentleman for that reason have the election laws repealed; and does he now recommend the repeal of a law which puts into the Treasury more than a hundred millions of revenue simply because a few moonshiners, who have some small distilleries hidden away among the mountains in some parts of the South, resist its enforcement?

This would sweep away all law, for there is none whose enforcement is not somewhere or at some time resisted. It would certainly lead to the repeal of all duties upon imports, because the Government has to keep a detective force to watch and occasionally make raids upon law-defying smugglers. Just imagine the venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania following the logic of his position and favoring this proposition. It would involve a conversion on his part unequaled by even that of Saint Paul. He further objects to this law because, he says, it creates a system of espionage to which the people should not be subjected. Is this not true of all laws for the collection of taxes?

The assessors of your towns and cities search the records to discover your real estate; they inquire into the affairs of your household to learn of your taxable furniture; they look over your goods, wares, and merchandise, and even put you under oath and force you to swear to the sum of your possessions, or doom you, in default thereof, to suffer such assessments as they shall chose to make. And the customs officials search your vessel, overhaul your cargo, knock open your boxes, pry into your trunks, break your packages, open the folds of your garments, reach into your pockets, and sometimes go even further than this, into your private affairs to insure an honest collection of the duties due the Government. The gentleman does not complain of this scrutiny, yet it is much closer than any which is exercised in the collection of the internal revenue. Indeed I think that from the honest tax-payer, who seeks not to escape from bearing his share of the public burdens, little complaint is heard against either of these methods of taxation.

But to return to a more direct discussion of the bill before the House, I desire to say that I have observed with no little admiration the various directions from which the friends of this bill come to its support.

Their different positions appear to be quite as inconsistent with each other as they are ingenious.

The first proposition to which we are treated is that it is entirely a business question and should be decided upon business considerations; and yet the gentleman who lays down this proposition proceeds, in the course of his remarks, to urge the passage of the bill upon temperance grounds, picturing to us in frighful colors the drunkenness that will follow the taking of this whisky out of bond and throwing it upon the market. And yet, in almost the same breath in which he urges this as a temperance measure, we are told that if this bill does not become a law this bonded whisky is not to be thrown upon the market at all to create the havoc of dissipation just now so vividly described, but on the other hand we are threatened that before the taxes upon it become due it will be shipped away, that great shrinkage will take place during its absence, whereby the Government will lose a large amount of revenue. Well, perhaps if it should never return the people would not therefore be greatly the losers.

The second gentleman who advocates the passage of this bill reiterates the proposition of the first, affirming with great emphasis that it is simply a business question, but proceeds at once to appeal to the House for its passage on the ground that whisky has great and peculiar claims upon the generous and charitable consideration of the country because of its high character as a tax-payer. He says it has paid into the national Treasury during the last ten years a thousand million of dollars.

But when I ask him, inasmuch as he has stated to us the amount of taxes whisky has paid, to be kind enough to inform the House what sum of taxes whisky has made during the same period in which it has been paying taxes, he declines to answer the question. Indeed, he resents it as inadmissible and impertinent, says it has nothing to do with the subject, and shields himself under the shadow of his first proposition, that it is only a business question.

And, again, the next gentleman proceeds to argue that this bill should be discussed and decided as a cold business proposition, regardless of its moral bearings, and without the indulgence of any sentiment upon the subject; but how soon does he jump that narrow track, run off into a graphic description of the bankruptcy and ruin, the poverty and sorrow, which he says are sure to fall upon the poor whisky producer and whisky owner should this bill not become a law.

The picture which he draws of the tears of the woe-stricken wives and impoverished children of these unfortunate and hardly-used whisky dealers in its pathetic coloring is very striking and impressive, and my heart was keenly touched by his statement of the warm sympathy which, to his surprise, he received from some members who come from the cold climes of the North, whose people he had supposed were a calculating lot of trafficers in whom the milk of human kindness was frozen.

I am glad the gentleman has come to the truth in this respect. He will find in the future as in the past, when the people of the South have been visited by floods and pestilence, that up under the icebergs of the North are warm hearts that respond readily and generously to every proper object of human sympathy.

But let us see what this bill means as a business proposition. It amounts simply to this: It proposes that the Government shall loan to the owners of whisky in bond $70,000,000 on two years' time at 4½ per cent. interest. That the Government is the creditor of the whisky owner; that this seventy millions will soon become due to the Government; that he asks only an extension of the time of payment changes not the nature of the proposition. If I owe my neighbor $1,000, due at any future specified time, the day when the debt matures the thousand dollars is his. If I consent to extend the time of payment that constitutes a new loan, which he is under no more legal or moral obligation to make than if no previous transaction had existed between us.

The day when this whisky tax becomes due it will belong to the Government. It should then be in its Treasury. To extend the time of payment two years would be as complete a loan to the whisky owners as if the money were taken out of the Treasury and loaned to them directly to enable them to carry their stock, as this extension of the time of payment is proposed to do. Now, what are the reasons urged why the Government should make this great loan to the whisky owners? We are told that the situation is this: that the whisky men have produced their commodity in large excess of the demands of consumption; that to force it upon the market will involve them in great loss and some of them in bankruptcy; they therefore petition the Government to come to their rescue and save them from the legitimate consequences of their own improvidence. To say nothing of the good or harm of the whisky business, how do these parties differ from others whose misfortunes, or want of foresight, or overreaching avarice have led them into distress? If this bill is to become a law, why should not the shipbuilding interest, so often depressed, come to Congress in the day of its disaster for help? Why should not the farmer when his crops are short and bring him insufficient returns, the merchant when he is forced to sell upon a declining market and can not meet his paper of maturity, the manufacturer when low prices and dull demand stop his spindles and put out the fires in his furnaces, seek relief from the Government Treasury? But it is said that the banks hold a large amount of this whisky as collateral security, and that if the tax is demanded when due they will be sufferers. Is whisky the only security which banks have held by which they have suffered or are likely to suffer? I think not. A bank in my own town will be glad to have the Government make good quite a large investment in railroad bonds; and I think that in all sections of the country national banks, savings institutions, individual investors, and speculators of every class may be found who would like to have the Government come to their rescue and save them from the consequences of their improvident ventures. Why not they as well as the whisky dealers? Indeed this bill as a precedent is full of mischief. It sets an example which, if followed, would make the Government patriarchal instead of democratic, and reverse entirely the theory upon which it was established. A government should not attempt to exercise a parental or guardian care over the private business of the people. Its laws should seek to give a free and equally open and unobstructed course to every one and leave each to be responsible for his own undertakings, to reap their fruits whether of success or failure.

As a temperance movement I do not believe this bill will receive many proselytes. It does not provide against taking this 70,000,000 gallons of whisky out of bond. It only defers the time of taking it out and placing it upon the market. It is to strengthen the whisky interests by a loan of the enormous sum of $70,000,000 for two years. In the mean time the whisky men, relieved of their present embarrassment, reassured and restrengthened, will continue to produce their commodity.

One of the advocates of this bill says that the future product will be reduced if the whisky distillers control themselves; but what right have we to expect that they will do in future what they have not done in the past? Though they knew there was a large surplus, they continued to produce and increase it. They complain also that the law is rigorous and the tax upon whisky exceptionally high. I will not now discuss the reasons for laying this large tax upon whisky. They are patent, I think, to every intelligent person and need no explanation. It is sufficient to say that the producers when they distilled and the owners when they purchased knew what the tax was and acted with their eyes open. They have been put to no disadvantage by laws enacted subsequent to their production and purchase. Why should not they, like those engaged in every other industry in the country, while they are glad to receive the enormous profits be willing to suffer the losses of their business? Is there anything in the character of this business which peculiarly recommends it to the fostering care of the Government—anything which indeed should make it in that respect exceptional and a favorite?

I know the friends of the bill complain at the discussion upon our side of this phase of the question, but they have themselves put the character of their client into the case. They have claimed for whisky that it should receive especial consideration because of its great productiveness of revenue. Having done this, they can not justly complain of us for discussing its character as a tax-maker. I do not wonder that they desire to have that subject let alone or very tenderly handled. Indeed I was not surprised that the gentleman from Kentucky when I asked him how many taxes whisky had made failed to give to this House the requested information. Indeed if it were within the limits of possibility to obtain the statistics, and the gentleman had them in his possession, I doubt that his powers of computation would enable him to cast up the sum. It needs not that a man should be what gentlemen are pleased to style a temperance crank, it needs not that he should be a teetotaler or a prohibitionist, it needs only that he should be an intelligent man, observant of what is transacting in every community, to know that the whisky traffic inflicts upon our people one of the greatest of all their misfortunes, and it needs only that one should be a patriotic man and a lover of his race that he should most deeply deplore it. And when the gentleman from Kentucky was depicting in colors so vivid the tears and sorrows of the wives and children of the whisky dealers to be made bankrupt by payment of their taxes, I could not but think how much broader field he might have had for his eloquent description had he attempted a recital of but a small fraction of the pains and sorrows, misery, degradation, and crime of which whisky has been the prolific parent.

Whisky pleading for sympathy is like the boy who having murdered his father and mother, when convicted of the crime and asked why sentence of death should not be pronounced upon him, appealed with tearful eyes to the court to have mercy upon a poor orphan!

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] says he desires the repeal of the whisky tax because he wants free raw material, and following the example of his colleague [Mr. COX] in discussing this bill treats us to a speech upon the tariff. What does he mean by "raw material?" Will he please define the term as he understands it? If whisky is not a manufactured article will he be so kind as to inform us what is? The whisky may be raw enough, to be sure, but every item of its cost from the sowing of the grain to its production in the market for sale, except the interest upon the value of the ground in which the grain grows and the machinery by which it is made, is for labor. Raw material indeed! You may as well call cotton or woolen cloth, boots and shoes, silk dresses, and suits of satin raw material as whisky. More than 90 per cent. of its value is the result of labor. Herein lies the error of the gentleman and those of his school. They call wool raw material, yet who does not know how largely labor enters into the product of wool? Those of that school who are builders speak of bricks and lumber as raw material, yet there is nothing of raw material in the one except the clay of which they are made and the wood with which they are burned, nor of the other except the trees standing in the forest. All else of their value has been contributed by labor. Indeed, there is no tax or duty levied upon any raw material in this country by the Federal Government. There is no raw material except the earth and what is within and grows upon it, the waters and what they contain, the air and its forces, and upon these the Government lays no duties.

A protective tariff should be equal at least to the difference between the price of labor in this country and abroad. Will the gentleman who talks so learnedly of free raw material tell me why the farmer who produces wool should not be protected in his payment of that difference to his employés as well as the manufacturer who makes it into cloth, or why he who converts growing trees into manufactured lumber or ore into pig-iron should not be protected by sufficient duties in paying American wages to American workmen as well as he who purchases their product and employs labor upon it for its further manufacture?

The fact is that they who so glibly advocate free raw material are believers in free trade in all manufactured articles until they come into their own possession for further manufacture, at which boundary they commence to be protectionists and so continue up to the point where they dispose of their goods.

But I will not follow what I regard as a vicious practice of this House and make a tariff speech upon a bill to extend the time of payment of taxes due upon bonded whisky. I have done this only so far as to answer the gentleman's assumption that whisky is raw material. The tariff I prefer to discuss upon another and more appropriate occasion, if I shall do so at all. I desire to call the attention of the House to one other point in connection with this subject, and then I will not further occupy its attention. Gentlemen declare that we must repeal the whisky tax to prevent the continued accumulation of a surplus of revenue in the national Treasury. They profess to be greatly alarmed by this surplus. I must confess that it does not frighten me at all. I think that a government which owes nearly $1,500,000,000 need not be obliged to search far to discover a place for the proper and judicious investment of its surplus income. If that investment can not be favorably made to-day it may be so placed as to be ready to meet the liabilities of the Government at their maturity. The surplus revenue may be in part wisely used to educate the illiterate we may now have among us and those who are continually flocking to our shores to become citizens and law-makers. Indeed, I would prefer rather that every soldier whose brave deeds and generous sacrifices have contributed to save the nation's life and secure to us this magnificent reunited country, proud, powerful, and grand as it is, should receive a generous pension from the surplus revenues of the Government than that they should be given to an industry which has wrought among the people so much sorrow, degradation, and ruin as the manufacture and sale of whisky.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I now yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CALDWELL].

Mr. CALDWELL. The whisky-men have been treated in this debate as if they were outside not only of sympathy but of any rule of equity. They have been denounced as the manufacturers of the dynamite of civilization.

Now, I beg leave to remind gentlemen that if this class of citizens is thus to be proscribed and vituperated, the Government is in partnership with them. If the Government has made a covenant with iniquity and issued a license to sin and taken a bond of hell, its representatives stand here with a poor grace when they urge this House to turn a deaf ear to the cry for relief of the very people who are their copartners.

I can understand very well how a gentleman might act who thought that the whisky traffic and the whisky manufacture ought to be abolished entirely. But I can not understand how gentlemen can take the money derived from a participation in the alcoholic traffic and manufacture and put it into the public Treasury, and then turn upon the men who have furnished that money and cover them with abuse and deny them relief.

The advantages of that partnership were all on one side. The risk, the investment of capital and labor, are required at the hands of the weaker partners, the whisky men. The Government has taken no risk, but has filled its Treasury to repletion and overflowing with this ill-gotten gain. The Government has profited by this trade, and now, when its money-bags are astrut almost to bursting, it is trying to drive these men into bankruptcy and into ruin. That is not only inequitable, but it is absolutely disgraceful.

If these men are in a calling contra bonos mores, so is the Government. You are dealing here with your weaker partners. They have an equitable right to demand at your hands that you shall not insist, like Shylock, on the nomination of the bond. There is not a court of equity in the world that would not read either in or outside of the lines and interpret in the spirit if not in the letter of the bond that the weaker partners are entitled to some measure of relief when they are suffering from the tyrannical and oppressive acts of their too-powerful superior.

The taunt has been thrown at these men that they are monopolists. If so, then it is the result of the vicious system which has been in vogue in this country for many years, a system which has fostered monopolies. You made the monopoly possible, and you tempted these men to create it. One who was without sin himself prayed that he might not be tempted. If these men under your system have overproduced and formed a monopoly, the Government is to blame for it.

The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] saw proper to tabulate some telegrams. I will print in my remarks for the consideration of the House statements from bankers, business men, distillers, and prominent citizens in the city of Nashville who affirm the fact that this extension of the bonded period will not injure any living man, but will be for the general common weal of the country.

The Government is now about to take a spasm of righteousness, I presume, to drive out their wicked partners, who come here simply to ask not a loan, as was conclusively shown by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON], but to ask a stay of execution. One gentleman [Mr. CUTCHEON] asked the question if anybody ever heard of interest being paid upon a stay of execution. I would ask if anybody ever heard of any State where interest under stay law was not required? The practice is of universal prevalence. But I have not time to speak further on that.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] said that if these men were driven to export this whisky which is now in bond, it would be a happy riddance. I presume that is characteristic of the philanthropy of New England. You are willing to go into partnership and manufacture this poison, and then as a part of human philanthropy to send it out to poison your neighbors.

Here is a proposition which the Government can not well fail to entertain, which will injure no man, and which ultimately will redound to the absolute revenue of the Government. But if you drive these men to the wall, self-preservation being the first law of commerce as well as of nature, they will be driven to any expedient by which they can escape bankruptcy and the forfeiture of their property. Hence they will export this material, and the Government will be deprived of all revenue from it.

Men who favor sumptuary legislation and interference with individual liberty may not be induced to consider that the Government is a copartner in a great undertaking like the whisky business, and hence seek to deal oppressively in this matter. But no man, not dominated by fanatical ideas and seeking to make the General Government invade the domain of morals and local police legislation, can fail to admit the fact of the responsibility of the internal-revenue system for the monopolies and overproduction of whisky, and hence the utter injustice in refusing this demand.

Gentlemen talk glibly of jobs and undue advantages sought by this extension of the bonded period. No proof has been offered. It is a cheap sort of argument that convinces itself by the assertion of fraud. It convinces no man, not even he who makes it. Against this I put the statements telegraphed to me by honorable men in all walks of business life, who would scorn to countenance a ring, fraud, or raid upon the Government.

These men are identified with the material interests of Tennessee and the Union. They command the respect and confidence of our people. They are capable judges and honest men. Are not speculators nor monopolists, and I put their names and fame against insinuations without probability and assertions without proof.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, I would be reluctant to undertake in this impromptu fashion to make reply to the elaborate speech of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT]; and I am very much relieved from any necessity for doing so by noticing that some parts of the speech very carefully answer the rest of it; and the main object I have in taking the floor is not to make elaborate reply, but only to emphasize some of his own replies.

The gentleman seems to be in a great state of mind upon the subject of raw materials. Nothing on earth will satisfy him except "free raw materials;" and no price on earth, in his judgment, is too great to pay for them. He has announced that for the sake of "free raw materials" he will vote to take all the taxes off wool, and for "free raw materials" he will agree to put on wool all the taxes that can be imposed upon it.

He has been conspicuous for the last three or four years in declaiming against the inequalities of our tariff laws; yet nevertheless he purposes, if his declarations are to be carried out, to vote for a bill which contains every irregularity of which he ever complained, with this sole modification—that it is 20 per cent. lower! He has proclaimed his disbelief in the bill for which he announces his intention to vote. What fairer commentary can there be upon Democratic policy than such a declaration from one of the foremost business men that are still left in the ranks of that party? What a strange commentary it is upon their situation that a man declares himself ready to vote three different ways, in every one of which he disbelieves; and he has the applause of the Democratic side! I suppose he took one-third of them on one bad proposition, another third on another bad proposition, another on the rest; and all of them upon the general wrongfulness of his situation. [Laughter.]

"Free raw materials!" And all this on a question of taxing table whisky! What does the gentleman mean by "raw materials?" I tell you that unconsciously to himself (for I like him thoroughly) he is juggling with words. When you come to figure it down to just what he means, you will find that "raw material" is something out of which you can make bar-iron—nothing else. [Applause.] Why, sir, in the letter which he wrote in his haste to get in advance of the funeral procession of which he has spoken so kindly, he proclaimed to the people of New York that he was in favor of repealing all tax upon raw materials and (mark the addition) upon food products. What does he mean by raw materials? He intended you to understand by that term materials upon which no labor has been expended. Where is the raw material which will come under such a definition in his own iron business? Why, sir, it is the round earth without so much as a hole in the ground. I tell you there is no such thing as value without human labor; and if the gentleman purposes to allow for the difference of labor in this country upon one class of materials why should he refuse to do it upon another? Where is the logical consistency of stopping protection at the mouth of the mine and protecting at the door of the mill? The gentleman's personal situation has led him to magnify his microcosm into a macrocosm, if the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] will allow me to intrude upon his favorite domain of philosophical language. [Laughter.] He is making out of his little world everybody's big world.

Why, sir, I figured out the gentleman's letter as it would affect us up in the State of Maine—I have not the figures with me, because until he made his speech this afternoon the whole subject had entered in my mind as it had in everybody else's, into the limbo of the buried past. But I recall the effect of his doctrine as to "food products." Why, sir, it would cut off 25 per cent. of every dollar of the production of the farmers of Maine. It would cut off every dollar of their profit; and the result would be one of the most picturesque ruins that even the Democratic party ever caused upon the face of the earth.

Food products and raw materials! All the men who labor before things get to his mill are not to be protected; all men are to be protected afterward. It looks to me as if the Democratic party was undertaking to patronize the rich and forget the basis of society, the agriculturists. When they come to examine the figures showing the result that is to follow their wholesale attempt they will shrink from it as badly as some of them did last night at the caucus.

But I know one of the purposes of the speech of my friend. It was to show that he could accommodate himself to all the factions of the Democratic party, from my protectionist friend from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE], who wants a big tariff on wool, down to my free-trade friend from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON], who would be glad to cut the whole thing entirely up by the roots. I am rejoiced to have the gentleman from New York proclaim not only the present aspect of this free-trade movement which every one could see, but the future, which all these free-trade leaders have been for days and weeks denying. He says that even the proposed enormity is only a step in the right direction. Even this does not suit his wide views or the broad grasp of his educated mind. It was intended simply for Democrats who have not advanced far enough; but when he can lead them to the Pisgah heights of the "Morrison bill" there in front of them will lie the promised land of agriculture devoid of all manufactures, free from anything to trouble or molest or make the Democrat afraid. [Laughter and applause.]

But the use of a prophet in this world is to forewarn people, and although my friend has not yet become a practical statesman, because none of his projects have yet taken life, he has succeeded in becoming a practical prophet and showing the people of this country what we are to expect from those who train with him. [Laughter.]

Need I say more after what he has said? Is not this an addition to what he was kind enough to say sufficient to cover all the ground?

Why he says the Democratic party at some time are to be at the Republican funeral. I tell you, gentlemen, that you will never be at any such scene until you get to believe in something, to stand by something, to be a united people capable of producing something that does not disturb the business interests of the country. But as long as you go on as you always have, staggeringly and putteringly trying to destroy the business prosperity of this country you will never attend any Republican funeral, but you will be at your own every time. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Chairman, I think after the Democratic caucus which occurred last night that a distinguished Democrat should pronounce a eulogy on cocktails this morning. [Laughter and applause.] I am absolutely gratified that that sweet, saintly-faced leader of the Democratic party who led a Democratic House into the passage of the electoral commission by which Tilden was defeated for the Presidency should read the Republican party a lesson this morning. He is the proper gentleman to assume that position, and as he led you wrong then, he may lead you wrong now. I say this in profound respect and abundant reverence. [Laughter and applause.]

I am, further, glad of the fact that the gentleman will vote for this bill. I intend to vote for it, and I do not propose to be perturbed or disturbed by public clamor with reference to it. I am going to vote for it to keep $70,000,000 out of the Treasury. [Laughter.] Will he vote for it on that ground?

I desired to-day, when the resolution was pending before this House to appropriate $125,000 to relieve the sufferers of the Mississippi Valley, a river that traverses thirteen States and two Territories in connection with the Missouri—when I desired to offer an amendment to make it a million, one of my Democratic friends said, "I am going to demand the previous question, and I will cut off your amendment."

I want this country to know that your whole course is a sham and a fraud. Why do you not pass a bill requiring the Treasury of the United States, which is held in the custody of a gentleman from New York, to put your surplus money into circulation. You have a majority here, you are capable of doing it, and yet last night at your caucus you could not tell whether you were going to repeal the internal-revenue taxes or the tariff. Now, is not that the honest truth?

I am for a tariff—a high protective tariff. I was born and educated in the State of Pennsylvania, and I will stand by her interests. If it be necessary to protect them, I will vote to take the tax off of whisky and tobacco, and will not apologize to the people for so doing.

What will you do? You have the absolute control of this House, and yet I declare here now that you have not got the courage to vote for this bill extending the bonded period. We will find it out to-night or to-morrow; but I want the country to know that with a majority of seventy in this House you have not got the courage to do a courageous act.

I appeal to you, my friends from the South, I appeal to you earnestly and energetically, that, with the courageous and enterprising people of the West, we will take into our own hands the control of this Government, and run it for the benefit of 30,000,000 people who live along the valley of the Mississippi and beyond it. Why should you and I allow two States and little New England to run this vast and magnificent empire? Let us stand up like men. [Laughter.] Oh, yes; you laugh; but you have not the courage I have or you ought to have.

I say that, after we have appropriated from the beginning of this Government down to this hour 90 per cent. of our revenue for the benefit of Pennsylvania and New York, you men of the South have not the courage, although you have the control of this House, to stand together and demand that you shall have a fair proportion of the money that is in the Treasury of this Government. [Laughter and applause.]

The day is gone by when I have any prejudices against the South. We had a great disagreement; we had an unpleasant quarrel; but this is our country, the whole of it, from the lakes in the north to the Gulf in the south. You have got control of this body, and I propose as one member to stand solidly and stanchly by the South until we see her impoverished people as grand in their capacity, in the measures of usefulness, as the people of the North, and I demand and desire that you co-operate with me in this result. I am a Republican and you are Democrats, yet our interests are indissolubly connected. We can not separate them if we would. The empire is there to-day and not here, and I hope the Democratic party will have the courage, because you have the majority, to see to it that the interests of that section along the Mississippi River and the West shall be thoroughly advanced. Be heroes and not cowards is my advice to your caucus. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I ask the attention of my colleague for a moment. I desire to say that under the impression that I was entitled to the floor for an hour in my own right I have promised to yield to a number of gentlemen who desire to be heard on this bill. And I did that, as I have said, under the impression that I would be entitled to the floor. The Chairman on yesterday led me to believe that I would hardly get that hour until late to-day. I hope the gentleman, therefore, will not cut off debate now, but will allow me to take the floor, if the Chair will recognize me, so that I may have the opportunity of yielding to the gentlemen to whom I have promised portions of my time. I do not care for more than ten or fifteen minutes myself; but I hope my colleague will allow me, under the circumstances, to yield to other gentlemen who desire to occupy the floor in my time.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It is useless for me to deny what goes without saying, and what the gentleman from Kentucky, my colleague, knows, that I have no desire or wish to cut him off from all possible opportunities of debate on this question. But I united my own efforts with those of the chairman more than once to-day to find my colleague from Kentucky, and did find him at last, in order to get him to claim the hour which he had asked. Now the debate up to this time shows that there have been nearly two hours of time consumed by the opponents of this measure in excess of the time occupied by its friends. My colleague is opposed to the bill; and I presume his time would be parceled out to gentlemen who entertain the same opinions.

But I have no choice about the matter. I am not making a point as to the length of time which has been consumed against the bill. I am willing, if it is the wish of the committee, to stay here for another hour or such length of time as it pleases and listen to the discussion of this measure. I can give the assurance that no gentleman will occupy one minute this evening in favor of the bill. I am willing, therefore, to yield entirely to the wishes of the committee. I only made the motion because the time at which the committee usually rises has already been reached and passed, and I thought I would test the sense of the committee as to whether it desired to continue the debate this evening or not.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I hope the committee will not rise, but will continue in session for the purpose of allowing me to fulfill my promises to those gentlemen around me.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am perfectly willing to withdraw the motion, but I am satisfied that other gentlemen around me will renew it. I should be glad if the committee would allow my colleague to take the time that he wants to use himself and then rise; but if we sit here an hour longer it will be considerably after 6 o'clock before adjournment.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I do not like to occupy the time myself after having given the promises that I have given to yield it to others.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It is only a question with me whether if I withdraw the motion some other gentleman will not renew it. I am notified by gentlemen all around me that it will be renewed if I withdraw it.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Then I hope that I may be permitted to take the floor now and have my time to yield to these gentlemen to-morrow.

Mr. BLACKBURN. By an order of the House it has been determined that there shall be but an hour-and-a-half debate to-morrow. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will first occupy the floor, and the members of the Committee on Ways and Means are entitled to the last hour.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. For myself I do not care to hear the question further debated. I am ready to vote now. My sentiments were exhibited on this bill two years ago. But I have made these promises and I do not like to disappoint other gentlemen.

Mr. THOMPSON. I hope the committee will allow my colleague to proceed for fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The only question before the committee is on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky that the committe do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DORSHEIMER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the bonded-extension bill, had come to no conclusion thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 215) reappropriating the sum of $125,000, not expended, for the relief of sufferers by the floods of the Mississippi River.

BENJAMIN WILKES.

Mr. SHELLEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6254) providing for the adjudication of the claim of Benjamin Wilkes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

RECONSTRUCTION OF THE NAVY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In my annual message I impressed upon Congress the necessity of continued progress in the reconstruction of the Navy. The recommendations in this direction of the Secretary of the Navy and of the naval advisory board were submitted by me, unaccompanied by specific expressions of approval. I now deem it my duty to advise that appropriations be made at the present session toward designing and commencing the construction of at least the three additional steel cruisers and the four gunboats thus recommended; the cost of which, including their armament, will not exceed $4,283,000, of which sum one-half should be appropriated for the next fiscal year.

The Chicago, Boston, Atlanta, and Dolphin have been designed and are being built with care and skill, and there is every reason to believe that they will prove creditable and serviceable modern cruisers. Technical questions concerning the details of these or of additional vessels can not wisely be settled except by experts; and the naval advisory board organized by direction of Congress, under the act of August 5, 1882, and consisting of three line officers, a naval constructor, and a naval engineer, selected "with reference only to character, experience, knowledge, and skill," and a naval architect and a marine engineer from civil life "of established reputation and standing as experts in naval or marine construction," is an appropriate authority to decide finally all such questions. I am unwilling to see the gradual reconstruction of our naval cruisers, now happily begun in conformity with modern requirements, delayed one full year for any unsubstantial reason.

Whatever conditions Congress may see fit to impose in order to secure judicious designs and honest and economical construction will be acceptable to me; but to relinquish or postpone the policy already deliberately declared will be in my judgment an act of national imprudence.

Appropriations should also be made without delay for finishing the four double-turreted monitors, the Puritan, Amphitrite, Terror, and Monadnock, and for procuring their armament and that of the Miantonomoh. Their hulls are built and their machinery is under contract and approaching completion, except that of the Monadnock on the Pacific coast. This should also be built, and the armor and heavy guns of all should be procured at the earliest practicable moment.

The total amount appropriated up to this time for the four vessels is $3,546,941.41. A sum not exceeding $3,838,769.62, including $866,725 for four powerful rifled cannon and for the remainder of the ordnance outfit, will complete and equip them for service. Of the sum required only two millions need be appropriated for the next fiscal year. It is not expected that one of the monitors will be a match for the heaviest broadside ironclads which certain other governments have constructed at a cost of four or five millions each. But they will be armored vessels of an approved and useful type, presenting limited surfaces for the shot of an enemy, and possessed of such sea-going capacity and offensive power as fully to answer our immediate necessities. Their completion having been determined upon in the recent legislation of Congress, no time should be lost in accomplishing the necessary object.

The gun foundery board, appointed by direction of Congress, consisting of three Army and three Navy officers, has submitted its report, duly transmitted on the 20th day of February, 1884, recommending that the Government should promote the production at private steel works of the required material for heavy cannon, and that two Government factories, one for the Army and one for the Navy, should be established for the fabrication of guns from such material. An early consideration of the report is recommended, together with such action as will enable the Government to construct its ordnance upon its own territory and so to provide the armaments demanded by considerations which concern the national safety and honor.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 26, 1884.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, for five days, on account of important business.

To Mr. COOK, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. LACEY, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

EXPLORATIONS IN ALASKA.

Mr. COX, of New York, by unanimous consent submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed —— thousand copies of the report upon explorations in Alaska by E. W. Nelson, the report to form one quarto volume, with the necessary illustrations.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

RECONSTRUCTION OF THE NAVY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, on motion of Mr. LOGAN, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 26, 1884.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 4993) making it a felony for a person to falsely and fraudulently assume or pretend to be an officer or employé acting under authority of the United States or any Department thereof, and prescribing a penalty therefor, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of Lewis C. McLaughlin, commander, and Alexis W. Penson, adjutant, Brooklyn, N. Y., for Devin Post, No. 148, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of New York, praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 1, repealing the limitation to the arrearage-of-pensions act of 1879; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the telegraphic memorial of J. S. Ferho, president, and Charles M. Travis, secretary, on behalf of the American inventors' convention now in session at Cincinnati, Ohio, protesting against the passage of any measure impairing the rights of inventors or depriving them of the legitimate fruits of their labor; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I present a memorial very numerously signed by residents of Milwaukee, Wis., protesting against the repeal of an act passed March 1, 1879, permitting vinegar-makers by a vaporizing process to separate the alcoholic properties of the mash produced by them and to inject the same into water for the purpose of making vinegar.

These memorialists represent that the act has now been in practical operation for four years and has proved itself beneficial both from a commercial and sanitary standpoint; that it has afforded the people of the United States the best, purest, and most healthful vinegar at the lowest possible price; that it has driven from the market all impure and adulterated vinegars; that it has created a new branch of consumption for grain, and enabled American vinegar-makers to compete with foreign manufacturers, thereby opening a new channel of export for vinegar and meats and vegetables put up in the same, and that it has prevented the great loss formerly occasioned by decay of much of all classes of pickled goods put up in impure vinegar. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN presented a memorial of inventors and manufacturers of Chicago, Ill., remonstrating against certain legislation now pending in regard to patents and patentees; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Brighton, Ill., praying for the repeal of certain laws permitting the use of vapors of alcoholic spirits in the manufacture of vinegar; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HOAR. I present the petition of the owners of the late merchant bark Forest Belle, in reference to the proposed return of the residue of the Chinese indemnity fund, and praying, if such return be made, compensation from that fund for their bark which was destroyed by Chinese in Chinese waters. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM presented a petition of the Chicago Trade and Labor Assembly, praying for the passage of certain measures in behalf of labor; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. VEST. I have been requested by the Delegate from the Territory of Utah to present a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of that Territory, protesting against the passage of the bills now pending in Congress or any other measures inimical to the people of Utah Territory until after full investigation by a Congressional committee. I have not read the memorial, but it seems to be couched in respectful language, and whatever may be thought about the merits of these bills, these people are citizens of the United States, and certainly have the right of petition. I will ask, unless there be objection, not that the memorial be read but that it be spread upon the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks that the memorial be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Territories. If there be no objection that order will be entered.

The memorial is as follows:

Memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

GENTLEMEN: We, your memorialists, the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah, respectfully represent, that we have been elected by the people of this Territory, under the provisions of the act of Congress known as the Edmunds law, to represent them in the local Legislature; that we have among other enactments made provisions for the filling of the registration and election offices as authorized by section 9 of that law, but our action has been rendered void by the refusal of the governor to sign the bill; that in consequence of that refusal one object of the Edmunds law has been frustrated, and the interests of our constituents have been jeopardized; that other bills needful to the progress of this Territory have been nullified by the governor; that measures have been introduced in your honorable body looking to extreme, and as we consider harsh and unjust, action toward the people of this Territory; that the measures have been prompted by untruthful statements made to your honorable body, and by misunderstanding of the facts and of the political situation in this Territory. We therefore consider it a duty we owe to our constituents to memorialize your honorable body, and plainly, if briefly, explain to you the truth, and appeal to you for a full investigation before any further steps are taken toward the curtailment of the liberties of a people who are famed throughout the world for many qualities that mark them as good citizens.

The pioneer settlers of the Territory of Utah, after traversing a wilderness of more than a thousand miles in extent, making the roads, building the bridges, and establishing ferries as necessity required, and having at the inception of their arduous journey given to the service of the Government five hundred of their most active and able-bodied men, who were called out to assist in fighting the battles of the country with Mexico, arrived in these valleys during the summer and fall of 1847.

They at once unfurled the flag of our country to the breeze and took possession of the land, which was then a part of Mexico, in the name of the United States, and, declaring their allegiance to this Government, made immediate preparations to assume the responsibilities and acquire the privileges of statehood under the auspices of the Federal Union.

This region was then considered by those who had the best opportunities of judging unfit for the habitation of any but savages of the most degraded type, and in its settlement the people had to contend with the destruction of their crops by frosts, by insects, by drought, and by the natural sterility of the soil, and to eke out a scanty subsistence upon thistle-tops and wild roots. But by their persistent industry they redeemed the land from barrenness, introduced a system of irrigation which has been imitated with profit in surrounding places, and made possible the settlement of localities adjacent which were then considered worthless, but are now flourishing States and Territories of the United States. They were the first to call the attention of Congress to the feasibility of constructing a transcontinental railroad, the line for which they trailed as they crossed the plains; they established the first printing-press west of the Missouri River, organized the first express company and mail line connecting the wild West with the borders of civilization, stretched hundreds of miles of the first telegraph line, and afterward aided in the building of the Pacific Railway that first bound the eastern to the western extremity of our common country. Although applying for admission into the Union as a State at the same time as California, a Territorial government was given to Utah, while California, with no greater claims, was granted the privileges and rights of statehood. But Utah did not murmur. The wise and republican policy was adopted of selecting from her resident citizens many of the officers appointed by the President and Senate, and under them, with the officers elected by the people, the Territory prospered and grew so rapidly in numbers, wealth, and importance as to attract the admiring attention of the world. Then the policy of the administration was changed, and strangers who had no interest in common with the people of Utah were sent to occupy the prominent appointive offices. Among the evils entailed upon the Territory by imported officers were these: One Federal official absconded with the funds appropriated by Congress to pay the Territorial Legislature. A Federal judge of notoriously immoral character and acts, finding Utah an uncongenial clime, deserted his post and returned to Washington with the false report that the Territory was in a state of rebellion, and that the records of his court, the Territorial library, and other public property had been destroyed. Without waiting to investigate these and other vile charges, the Government fitted out and dispatched troops to quell the supposed rebellion. Many millions of public money were wasted in this needless expedition, and after the rash step was taken beyond recall a commission was sent to investigate, who discovered that the whole movement was founded on falsehood, and subsequently the troops were withdrawn. The cost to the country and the proofs of its folly may be learned from the public records; but the cost to the people of Utah, and the trouble, vexation, loss of property, and difficulties entailed upon them by this vexatious escapade are known only to those who endured them. An official investigation before instead of after the expedition would have saved them much unjust suffering and the country an immense amount of money, which was all needed in the civil war that followed.

During that struggle for the supremacy of the glorious Union to which the people of Utah have ever been attached, although no draft was made upon her sons for regular military service, because she was but a Territorial dependency, yet when called upon by the parent Government for important aid they responded in such a manner as to elicit the thanks of the President. Within twenty-four hours after a dispatch from President Lincoln was received calling for men to protect the mail and Government trains from the attacks of the wild tribes of the plains a body of Utah militia were on the saddle, armed and equipped for the fray and moving en route for the scene of strife, where they performed signal service against the Indians and protected many helpless traveling citizens who were on their way to the Pacific coast. Yet this very militia were forbidden in 1870, by a proclamation of a Federal governor, to drill, muster, or assemble for any purpose. In consequence of this arbitrary order, one that was in direct violation of a constitutional provision, the citizens in the outlying settlements were exposed to the incursions of savage tribes, who were thus encouraged to make raids upon them because any organized assistance from the militia would be in violation of the governor's proclamation. So far was this order carried into effect that the aid of Federal soldiers was invoked to prevent the marching of a company of militia in Salt Lake City in a public celebration of the anniversary of American Independence. During the period of this invasion of the constitutional rights of citizens a chief-justice, newly appointed, joined with other officials in an attack upon the people to deprive them, under color of law, of rights vested in them by the organic act. In Washington city he proclaimed: "The mission which God has called upon me to perform in Utah is as much above the duties of other courts and judges as the heavens are above the earth, and whenever or wherever I may find the local or Federal laws obstructing or interfering therewith, by God's blessings I shall trample them under my feet."

The results of his remarkable maladministration of justice was that attorneys refused to trust the cases of their clients for adjudication, the business routines of the various courts were entirely blocked, and respectable American citizens languished in prison unable to secure trial, while criminals of the most notorious character were permitted to run at large.

In many instances well-known and worthy citizens were incarcerated merely on suspicion, and in others placed in durance vile on the testimony of men whose oath would not be taken in the most trivial civil case. Judicial chaos reigned supreme in a hitherto peaceful, quiet, and well-ordered community.

The Supreme Court of the United States, after a full and complete investigation, reversed nearly all the decisions of the Federal courts in this Territory then rendered, the chief-justice was removed, and order was again restored.

We refrain from enumerating many of the annoyances to which the people of Utah have been exposed through the overbearing and oppressive acts of imported officials, but must draw the attention of your honorable body to the course presented by the present executive. From the first he has allied himself with a clique of adventurers, busy in stirring up michief and circulating false rumors for the purpose of provoking ulterior measures that may result in their possible advantage. With nothing to lose and everything to gain, any turn of the wheel so long as it be in the direction of a revolution may bring up something to their pecuniary advantage. He has taken the stump in their interest, publicly insulted peaceable and respected citizens by untruthful allegations, and arrogated to himself extraordinary prerogatives. At the canvass for the election of 1880 he issued a certificate of election to his friend, the minority candidate, who received but 1,357 votes, while the candidate of the people received 18,568 votes. And the only excuse he could offer for this flagrant violation of his oath to uphold the laws of Congress, requiring the governor to "declare elected the person having the greatest number of votes and to issue a certificate accordingly," was that the minority candidate was "the person who, being a citizen, had the greatest number of votes." He thus assumed both judicial and legislative powers; judicial in passing upon the citizenship of a candidate who had served in Congress for several terms and whose citizenship had been acknowledged by that body which alone held the right to judge of the qualifications of its members; and legislative, in adding in the certificate to the law of Congress governing his duty the words "being a citizen." By this assumption and unlawful exercise of power he rendered void the franchises of more than 18,000 citizens, representing the overwhelming majority of the population. We are here reminded of the striking words of the lamented Garfield: "If in other lands it be high treason to compass the death of the king, it should be counted no less a crime here to strangle the sovereign power and stifle its voice."

He has on several occasions attempted to place in the local offices, for the purpose of controlling and disbursing the Territorial finances, irresponsible individuals who are the open enemies of the people. This he has done under a pretended construction of the organic act, but contrary to positive enactments of the Legislative Assembly, signed by his predecessors, virtually sanctioned by Congress, and deemed valid because of rulings rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States. He has, by an arbitrary exercise of the veto power, refused to sign bills enacted by the Legislature unless provisions were incorporated therein in harmony with his personal designs and in extension of his executive powers. Even the educational interests of the Territory have been hampered and obstructed by his tyranny, and the Legislature have been prevented from appropriating the money of the people whom they represented for university purposes, according to the public desire. He has endeavored to injure the people whose interests he should labor to subserve, by attempting to inflame the public mind in his official utterances and documents, and to influence your honorable body to take extreme measures toward this Territory, by which the extraordinary powers vested in the executive shall be enlarged to the extent of complete despotism. To further this object his report to the Secretary of the Interior and his message to your memorialists were drawn up, containing many absolute falsehoods and misrepresentations and distortions of facts and conditions, against which we earnestly protest and concerning which we desire and ask for impartial investigation.

It was in consequence of some of these inaccurate and specious statements that the act of Congress known as the Edmunds law was hurriedly passed, without full debate, to satisfy the clamor of the multitude raised without reason and provoked by calumny. Under the provisions of that law many constitutional guarantees have been ignored and thousands of citizens have been deprived of vested rights, of that valuable property the elective franchise, which they had exercised for many years, without any process of law. This summary punishment was inflicted upon them without indictment and without trial by operation of a test-oath which virtually made them witnesses against themselves, and which was ex post facto in its effects. This oath has been imposed upon the whole body of citizens without authority of law, being formulated by the Utah Commission, on whom no legislative powers were conferred by the Edmunds law, from which their authority is solely derived. It is as follows:

TERRITORY OF UTAH,
County of ——:

I, —— ——, being first duly sworn (or affirmed), depose and say, that I am over 21 years of age, and have resided in the Territory of Utah for six months, and in the precinct of —— one month immediately preceding the date hereof, and (if a male) am a native-born or naturalized (as the case may be) citizen of the United States, and a tax-payer in this Territory; (or if a female) I am a native-born, or naturalized, or the wife, widow, or daughter (as the case may be) of a native-born or naturalized citizen of the United States; and I do further solemnly swear (or affirm) that I am not a bigamist nor a polygamist; that I have not violated the laws of the United States prohibiting bigamy or polygamy; that I do not live or cohabit with more than one woman in the marriage relation, nor does any relation exist between me and any woman which has been entered into or continued in violation of the said laws of the United States prohibiting bigamy or polygamy; (and if a woman) that I am not the wife of a polygamist, nor have I entered into any relation with any man in violation of the laws of the United States concerning polygamy and bigamy.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this —— day of ——, A. D. 188–.

Registration Officer —— Precinct.

Your honorable body will perceive that under this oath, while men who cohabit with more than one woman "in the marriage relation" are excluded from voting and holding office, persons who commit the most flagrant sexual crimes are permitted to exercise the elective franchise and are eligible for any official position so long as their filthy acts are outside of the marriage relation. These words, we submit, are an interpolation, and are contrary to the language and intent of the Edmunds law. And they were first used by the present executive of this Territory, who compelled every applicant for the office of notary public to take an oath containing that phrase for the purpose of excluding polygamists and admitting libertines and notorious debauchees.

The commission who, usurping legislative functions, enacted this test-oath, were by the provisions of the Edmunds law authorized to remain in office until the Legislative Assembly should provide for the filling of the registration and election offices made vacant by the law and subject to the appointing power of the commission. Your memorialists respectfully represent that they have provided for the filling of those offices, and have passed an election law as they believed in full conformity to the Edmunds law and other acts of Congress, and incorporating the oath here annexed, to be taken by all applicants for registration, in order to exercise the elective franchise.

TERRITORY OF UTAH,
County of ——, ss:

I, —— ——, being first duly sworn, depose and say that I am a citizen of the United States; (or) I have declared on oath, before a competent court of record, my intention to become a citizen of the United States, and have taken an oath to support the Constitution and Government of the United States (as the case may be); I am over twenty-one years of age; I have resided in the Territory of Utah six months, and in the precinct of —— thirty days next preceding the date hereof, and I am not disqualified as a voter by any law of the United States or of the Territory of Utah.

—— ——.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this —— day of ——, 18–.

—— ——,
Assessor,

By —— ——,
Deputy Assessor.

This bill, a copy of which is herewith presented, was vetoed by Governor Murray. Your memorialists claim that it is strictly conformable to the laws of the United States and a measure needful to the present interests of the Territory, and that if the provision extending the elective franchise to persons not fully clothed with the habiliments of citizenship was objectionable, it might have been expunged without impairing the remainder of the bill. And yet it is in accord with section 1860 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which confers power upon the Territories thus to extend the franchise. The oath presented in the bill is free from the immoral and unlawful features of the test-oath enacted by the commissioners, but was too comprehensive for the Governor, as it would exclude from the privilege of voting, and consequently of local office-holding, all persons who are disqualified by any law of Congress or of the Territory. By vetoing this bill the Governor has defeated the intention of your honorable body to dispense with the services of the Utah Commission so soon as the conduct of elections was placed in the hands of non-polygamous officers appointed under the local laws. The evident object of this veto is to continue the commissioners in office and to provoke additional Congressional legislation, by which the small political liberty yet left to the citizens of this Territory may be yet further diminished and his gubernatorial domination may be extended.

Another instance of his arbitrary exercise of the veto power is the contemptuous manner in which he treated the bill passed by your memorialists apportioning the representation of the Territory. In the governor's message to the Legislature he recommended a new apportionment, "giving to each locality having the necessary population the right to choose its own members." Your memorialists promptly passed a bill apportioning the representation according to the population of the various districts. This was returned to the Legislature unapproved, with the statement by the governor that "the census of 1880 entitles every 12,000 of population to one representative in the council, and every 6,000 of population to one representative in the house of representatives." The message closed with the following paragraph:

"If the Legislature will pass an act apportioning the Territory into twelve council districts and twenty-four representative districts, as near as may be upon the foregoing basis, where each councilor and representative is to be voted for separately, I will be pleased to approve the same."

Another bill was drawn up in exact conformity to the governor's suggestion and promise, a copy of which is presented herewith. It passed both houses of the Assembly and was duly forwarded to him for signature. But he forfeited his pledged agreement and treated the bill with the contempt of utter silence, neither approving nor rejecting it; and such is the dependent condition of the Territory of Utah that it does not need even the absolute veto of the governor to render void an act passed by the people's elected representatives, but his neglect to sign it is more mighty than the combined labors of thirty-six legislators chosen by ballot to express the popular will. The object of this insulting treatment of the Legislature was, without doubt, to leave the way open for the passage of a measure, now before your honorable body, giving the governor alone the right to make the apportionment of the representation; although a very good law for this purpose, passed in 1880 and signed by his immediate predecessor, is now upon the Territorial statute-book, and there is no real necessity for any radical change.

Your memorialists submit that the political situation in Utah is this:

Four-fifths of the voting population, after excluding all who have been disqualified by the rulings of the Utah Commission and their extreme construction of the Edmunds law, belong to what is called the People's party and represent at least 80 per cent. of the entire population of this Territory. The other portion chiefly belong to what is called the Liberal party. The great fault of the majority seems to be that they select persons from among themselves to represent them and manage their local affairs. No person who has ever lived in the practice of polygamy is now permitted to vote or hold any office; therefore there can be no legal reason offered why the great majority of the voting citizens should not choose their local officers from among their own number. The only portion of the Territorial government under the control of the people is the Legislature, with the addition of a few ministerial officers to handle the funds raised by local taxation under the Territorial laws. The judicial and executive departments are in the entire control of the National Government, and all such offices are filled by national appointment. These, with other officials under Federal authority, including nearly all the postmasters, are numbered with the Liberal party, which, though in so small a minority, aims at the control of the only portion of the local government left to the people. And because the great body of the citizens refuse to accept the nominees of the minority, the proposition is made to abolish the Legislature, whose members are elected by the people, and establish in its stead a commission appointed by the President and Senate of the United States, and thus sweep away from the Territory the last vestige of republican government. It should be remembered that to-day the lawmaking department, elected by the people, is at the mercy of the appointed executive in the enactment of any law. The governor holds the power of absolute veto, and no two-thirds or even unanimous vote of the Legislature avails against his individual ditcum or simple indisposition to append to a bill his signature; at the same time your honorable body exercises the power not only to disapprove of any local enactment which the governor may feel inclined to sign, but also to legislate directly for the Territory. So while the local Legislature can not enact any law without the consent of the governor and the approval of Congress, laws can be and are enacted by Congress without any voice or consent of the people who are to be governed by them.

We respectfully ask if this is not sufficient national control and supervision over the only shred of political power left to the large body of American citizens who compose the voting population of this Territory?

We respectfully submit that the bills now pending in Congress in reference to Utah are manifestly unjust and altogether unnecessary, to say nothing of their utter incompatibility with the spirit and letter of the Constitution of the United States. Not only is no good and sufficient reason advanced for the substitution of a legislative commission for the Legislative Assembly of Utah, but the measure would be without precedent in the history of our country. The territory northwest of the Ohio was not governed in any such arbitrary manner as is proposed in these bills, but guarantees for local self-government were given to take effect when the then sparsely settled districts should contain inhabitants numbering but a small proportion of the present population of the Territory of Utah. There is no parallel between the case of any other section of the country which has been temporarily governed by persons appointed by the President and Senate of the United States and that of Utah, an organized Territory, which has held and exercised the right to enact its own laws for the last thirty-four years. The District of Columbia is not to be compared with a Territory organized for the very purpose of preparing it for the dignity and responsibilities of statehood, to which the District, wherein is the seat of National Government and over which Congress has "exclusive jurisdiction," can never attain. And we respectfully submit that, as it cannot now be alleged that polygamists make the laws or vote into office the members of the Legislature of Utah, the only pretext upon which such measures as the appointment of a legislative commission is founded is that the overwhelming majority of the voting citizens will not select men to represent them from the small minority which now monopolizes the offices in the gift of the National Government; in other words, that because the majority will not vote as desired by the minority, they should not be allowed to vote at all. This is a true statement of the fact, stripped of the specious sophistries which are so generally thrown around it.

That this extraordinary measure would be considered abroad as well as at home to be despotic and subversive of the rights of citizens, your memorialists cite to your honorable body the cases of Jamaica and Canada when similar propositions were made in relation to those colonies before the British Parliament. In 1839 Jamaica resisted certain direct legislation by the home government, and, considering that their legislative rights had been trampled upon by this interference of the British Parliament, the colonial assembly passed a resolution that it would abstain from the exercise of its legislative functions, except for the purpose of maintaining the public credit, until the obnoxious acts should be repealed and the members of the assembly be left "to the free exercise of their inherent rights as British subjects." A protest was forwarded to Great Britain which was considered insulting to the crown and Parliament. A bill was introduced "to suspend the existing constitution of the island for a limited number of years, and to provide during that interval its legislative functions should not be exercised except by the governor and council alone;" but this, although moderate and merciful in comparison with the measures in reference to Utah now before your honorable body, was considered even in monarchical England a grave stretch of governmental authority. The colonists were permitted to be heard by counsel when the bill was discussed, and Sir Robert Peel, who was a very radical supporter of the doctrine of the power of Parliament, and who denounced the course of the colonists as "foolish and unjustifiable," declared that the bill was "neither more nor less than one for the establishment of a complete despotism—one that would establish the most unqualified, unchecked, unmitigated power that was ever yet applied to the government of any community in place of that liberal system which had prevailed for upward of one hundred and fifty years," and he asked whether Parliament had "ever treated with so much severity a conquered colony amid the first heat of animosity after the contest." The measure failed, and the attempt to pass it cost the ministry, under Lord Melbourne, their official positions, for through its failure they were compelled to resign.

Canada not only protested against the interference of the home government, but made demands which Peel declared would, if conceded, establish in the colony "a French republic." These demands not being granted, the lower province proceeded to armed insurrection, and went so far as to measure arms with the regular British troops. The upper province joined in the rebellion, but both were defeated. Lord John Russell introduced a bill in Parliament to suspend the constitution of the colony. But this was deemed too severe and subversive of the rights of British subjects; so a new governor was sent out, the grievances of the people were inquired into, and subsequently Lord John Russell, who had proposed the obnoxious and oppressive measure, seeing and acknowledging his error, like a true statesman introduced a bill establishing home rule by a legislative union of the two provinces on the principles of free representative government, and on the wise policy advocated by the celebrated Fox that "the only method of retaining distant colonies with advantage is to enable them to govern themselves." Your memorialists respectfully ask whether it is too much to suggest that the example of Great Britain in examining into the alleged wrongs complained of by its colonies and refusing to violate the rights of its subjects and the principles of liberty that enter into every constitutional government might be profitably imitated by this great Republic in its policy toward Utah, which has never swerved from loyalty to the National Government nor rebelled against its laws, however severe?

There are other measures before your honorable body, which, if not so sweeping as the bills for governing Utah by legislative commission, are none the less hostile to the rights and privileges of citizens. The proposition to compel a wife to testify against her husband, we submit, would do violence to the rules of jurisprudence that have become reverable with age and sacred by usage for centuries. The highest judicial tribunal in the land has declared that the rule that neither the husband nor the wife shall be compelled to testify against each other is founded upon principles that "constitute the basis of civil society, to impair the sanctities of which would be to destroy the best solace of human existence," while to break it down would be "to shake the very foundations of society." To attach witnesses as is proposed, without previous service of subpœna and a disobedience of the mandate of a court, would be unprecedented and subversive of the rights of citizens; no person, however innocent, would be safe from seizure under such a law, while the individual accused of crime could give bail and be at liberty pending his trial; the alleged witness, not charged with any offense, could be captured and incarcerated for an indefinite period.

The elective franchise, now held by women voters, against whom no accusation is made and who can not be charged with polygamy or any other offense known to the law, is sought to be wrested from them, by which they would be summarily deprived of a right which they have exercised for twelve years or more.

The attempt in another bill to make non-membership in a certain religious organization a qualification for voting and holding office appears to your memorialists so utterly subversive of the plain limitations of the powers of Congress as defined in the Constitution and of the genius of our Government, that no remonstrance on our part will be necessary. The time has surely not arrived when a religious test shall be imposed as a qualification for any position of trust or as a disqualification for exercising the elective franchise.

Your memorialists have to complain of gross misrepresentations, by which your honorable body has been deceived in reference to the true sentiments of the people of Utah and their political and social status. The public mind has been inflamed in consequence of untruthful rumors, facts distorted, and tales invented, until it has become almost impossible to correct the false impressions that have been made, not only upon the country but also upon Congress. For added to the exaggerations of the pulpit and the press are official statements which naturally have great weight, but which in many respects are as incorrect as the common base fabrications designed to mislead and prejudice the public.

We earnestly protest against the passage of any measures that have been prompted by this popular agitation, caused by misconception of the facts, and urge that it can not be right, but it is manifestly unjust, to punish a whole community for the alleged offenses of a portion of its people, and to deprive a large body of citizens, against whom no crime can truthfully be charged, of the commonest political rights and privileges because they do not think as other people desire nor vote themselves under the control of those who persistently malign them.

Many of the people of Utah have descended from those noble patriots who struggled and bled for the liberties now enjoyed in the States of our glorious Union. They venerate the principles for which their ancestors lived and labored, fought and died. Shall they be deprived of the precious heritage bequeathed to them because they, like their forefathers, entertain religious views that are considered heterodox? Are they to be condemned and punished unheard? Shall popular clamor and sectarian animosities overawe the statesmen of the nineteenth century and prevail upon them to wrest from citizens against whom no offense against the law can be charged the commonest and yet most valued political rights and privileges? Because a few are accused of a practice that modern civilization condemns without understanding are their fellow-citizens who have committed no overt acts against the popular sentiment or the laws to be punished and relegated to serfdom? Are the services of the people who have opened up this vast region to civilized habitation and progress to be counted for nothing? Shall the many virtues of a sober, thrifty, industrious, and peaceable community be lost sight of because of one feature of their faith which modern society does not tolerate? Must the libels of official and other persons interested in the subjugation of Utah and its exclusion from statehood be always received as truth, and the denials and appeals for fair investigation by the accused people be ever rejected?

By the blood poured out in defense of the liberties we are prevented from enjoying; by the struggles of the early colonists against measures similar in essence to those against which we now protest; by the principles enunciated in the Declaration of Independence; by the guarantees of the national Constitution; by the right of local self-government, which is vital to American liberty; by the franchise which has become our valued property; by the toils and privations of the brave pioneers who led the way to these mountain fastnesses; by the just ambitions of our budding youth; by the bright hopes and lofty aspirations of a hundred and seventy thousand people who protest against oppression; by the vested rights of our sister Territories, whose freedom is menaced by the precedent afforded by our threatened political destruction; by that justice and equity which should be meted out to all the citizens of this great nation, irrespective of creed or party, we appeal to you not to condemn us unheard; not to take from us the few political privileges that distinguish us from conquered slaves; not to deliver our fair and flourishing Territory into the hands of men irresponsible to the people; not to reverse for us the established rules of civilized jurisprudence; not to disfranchise the innocent for the alleged offenses of the presumably guilty; not to encroach upon our rights of property; not to apply to us a religious test for political purposes, nor to pass any such rash and revolutionary measures as have been proposed, but to postpone any further action toward Utah until a committee of your own number or other disinterested persons appointed specially for the purpose shall have impartially investigated the whole subject of the situation in Utah and have reported to your honorable body, so that you may act with a fair understanding of all sides of these important questions. And your memoralists will ever pray.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. LAPHAM. The Committee on Patents have had a rehearing on the bill (S. 638) for the relief of George Milsom, Henry Spendelow, and George V. Watson, which they reported favorably on the 25th of January last with an amendment, and which is now upon the Calendar. I desire now by direction of the committee to submit a supplementary report, with a further amendment to the bill, to accompany the former report.

Mr. MITCHELL. In that case I desire to have leave to present a minority report. It is not now prepared, but I ask consent to present it when prepared.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the views of the minority will be received when ready.

Mr. MILLER, of California, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1871) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to offer a reward of $25,000 for rescuing or ascertaining the fate of the Greely expedition, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 61) to authorize Lieut. Henry R. Lemly, United States Army, to accept a position under the Government of the United States of Colombia, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. RANSOM subsequently said: While my attention was withdrawn a few minutes ago the joint resolution (S. R. 61) to authorize Lieut. Henry R. Lemly, United States Army, to accept a position under the Government of the United States of Colombia, was reported adversely and indefinitely postponed. I would like to have the joint resolution placed upon the Calendar until I can have an opportunity of looking into the matter further.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order of the Senate indefinitely postponing the joint resolution will be reconsidered if there be no objection. The Chair hears none; and the joint resolution will be placed upon the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1530) for the relief of the estate of John Cook, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1344) authorizing the Bellingham Bay Railway and Navigation Company to build certain bridges, wharves, and docks in the Territory of Washington, reported it with amendments.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MITCHELL introduced a bill (S. 1944) for the special and uniform instruction of State militia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1945) for the relief of Lieut. John C. Geyer; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1946) for the relief of Richard C. Ridgway and others; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1847) to authorize the issuing of a register to John S. McQuin and J. Warren Wonson for the schooner Druid.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. Res. 215) reappropriating the sum of $125,000, not expended, for the relief of sufferers by the floods of the Mississippi River; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

THE MONROE PAPERS.

Mr. MITCHELL submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be instructed to inquire into the expediency of printing the official letters and papers of the late President James Monroe, with power to report by bill or otherwise.

By unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to make a single remark in relation to the matter. I have a memorandum from Professor McMaster, who is professor of American history in the University of Pennsylvania, in relation to this subject. I found it interesting myself, and I think the committee will. I believe it important that provision should be made for the publication of these works of the late President Monroe. I think that nothing of a political character has ever been printed with regard to his official life except what is presented by himself in his views of his executive conduct. As is very well known, he was minister at the court of France at a very important time, when the Louisiana purchase was made, and also at a later time he was President when Florida was purchased and when the "Monroe doctrine" was announced. It is stated by Professor McMaster that the people generally have never had access to these important papers.

I desire to call the special attention of the Committee on the Library to the subject. I ask the reference of this memorandum to that committee, and that the resolution be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper referred to by the Senator from Pennsylvania will be referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. MITCHELL. To accompany the resolution.

HELEN M. FIEDLER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further "concurrent or other resolutions," that order is closed. The Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar under the eighth rule, commencing at Order of Business 160, being a resolution reported by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] from the Committee on Foreign Relations on the 5th of February, relative to the claim of Helen M. Fiedler, widow and executrix of Ernest Fiedler, deceased. The question is on agreeing to the resolution, which was read yesterday.

Mr. HOAR. I think the resolution was passed over yesterday at my request, so that the report might be found. I should like to have the report read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read, if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. MORGAN February 5, 1884:

The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred Senate bill 223 and Senate joint resolution No. 2, relating to the claim of Helen M. Fiedler, widow and executrix of Ernest Fiedler, deceased, praying on behalf of herself and children that Congress will intervene so as to aid her in collecting a claim alleged to be due to her late husband from the Government of Brazil, have carefully examined the evidence submitted to them touching the validity and justice of said claim, and respectfully report as follows:

In the year 1873 this claim was brought to the attention of the Government of Brazil through our minister resident, and it was considered by a department of that Government. The section of home affairs of the council of state made a report, a copy of which is annexed to this report, upon the validity of the claim. Whether that report was followed by an imperial order or decree disallowing the claim does not appear in the papers submitted to this committee.

The report of the section of home affairs of the council of state does not exclude the idea that something is due the memorialist, but concludes with an argument that the amount claimed is in excess of the loss and injury which Fiedler had sustained by the breach of the agreement entered into between him and a person who acted as the agent of Brazil in making the contract.

Comment is made in that report upon admissions which it alleges were made by our minister, Mr. Blow, in presenting Fiedler's case to the Government of Brazil, to the disadvantage of his claim. These comments are not accepted as being just to Mr. Blow, but the Government of Brazil could not justly deny the rights of Fiedler upon the facts presented, even if Mr. Blow had made admissions that tended to weaken or destroy their proper effect.

The evidence before the committee seems clearly to establish the following facts, and to show that Fiedler's claim is good in foro conscientiæ, and would receive the sanction of a court of justice in a controversy between private litigants.

On the 21st day of August, 1867, at the city of New York, Ernest Fiedler (now deceased), the owner of the steamship Circassian, of New York, then on her way to Bremen, of the first part, and D. de Goicouria, esq., who claimed to act as agent for immigration for the Brazilian Government, of the second part, made a contract in writing for the charter of the steamship Circassian for a voyage from the port of New Orleans, La., to Rio de Janeiro, Brazil. The vessel was engaged to carry passengers to be furnished by the second party from New Orleans to Rio de Janeiro. At the time the contract was made it was supposed that many citizens of the United States desired, in consequence of the condition of affairs here, resulting from our civil war, to emigrate to Brazil, and the Brazilian Government desired their presence there.

The parts of the contract material in this connection are that the vessel, which was then en voyage to Bremen, was to sail from New Orleans on the 15th day of November, 1867, weather permitting, unless detained at Bremen or elsewhere by causes beyond the control of the first party, in which case she should sail within ten days after her arrival at New Orleans, and that the second party (Brazil) should pay for the voyage the sum of $42,000 in American gold or its equivalent in milreis ten days after the completion of the voyage. The Circassian did not reach New York on her return voyage from Bremen until about the 1st of November, 1867. Certain alterations and repairs of the vessel were required to accommodate her to the transportation of the large number of passengers she was intended to carry, so that she did not leave New York until the 23d of November, 1867, and did not reach New Orleans until the 6th day of December of that year. Before her arrival at New Orleans it was ascertained that no passengers were there for embarkation.

On the 17th of December, 1867, Mr. Fiedler addressed a letter to Chevalier Fleury, chargé d'affaires of Brazil to the United States, setting forth the condition of affairs and asking his advice, whether he (Fiedler) should send the vessel to Rio de Janeiro without passengers and subject the Brazilian Government to the payment of the $42,000 agreed on as the price of the voyage, or whether the chargé would release him from his obligations. In this letter Mr. Fiedler stated that his expenses in preparing for the voyage amounted to about $20,000, and suggested that "remuneration of this sum would perhaps be preferable than in default forfeit $42,000 gold, equal to $55,000 currency." On the 18th of December the Brazilian chargé, in reply to Mr. Fiedler's letter of the 17th, advises Mr. Fiedler "not to allow the steamer to sail, but to consider the charter-party completely null and void," and further writes: "I shall immediately call the attention of my government to the subject, and ask it to take into consideration the sum represented by you, and to indemnify you for the losses sustained." On the next day (December 19) Mr. Fiedler acknowledged the receipt of the letter of the Brazilian chargé of the 18th, and added: "Relying upon your assurance and in full confidence of the just acts of your government, I have immediately telegraphed to New Orleans to withdraw the Circassian from her voyage, and ordered her return. As the preparations for this voyage have cost me an outlay of over $20,000, an early and prompt remittance is respectfully requested, and taking into consideration that I acted throughout in the interest of the Brazil Government, and would have gladly avoided the voyage had I not been forced by their agent to proceed, I hope my request will be granted."

The Emperor of Brazil has been advised by the section of home affairs of his council of state that the contract entered into between Mr. Fiedler and Mr. Goicouria, who claimed to be the agent of the Brazilian Government, was not valid, for the alleged reason that Mr. Goicouria was not, in fact or in law, such agent. It is evident that this advice was not well considered by the council of state for these reasons: Mr. Fiedler, before entering into the contract with Mr. Goicouria, very prudently sought to know the extent of Mr. Goicouria's authority, and upon inquiry found that Mr. Russell Sturgis, of New York, acting for the owners of the steamship Marmion, had in March, 1867, addressed a letter to the Brazilian legation to the United States, inquiring as to the authority of Mr. Goicouria to charter vessels for the Brazilian Government to carry emigrants from the United States to Brazil, and had received from the Brazilian legation the following reply:

BRAZILIAN LEGATION, New York, March 15, 1867.

SIR: In answer to your letter of yesterday's date, I have the honor to inform you the name of the agent of the Brazilian emigration, Mr. Guintino de Sonza Bocayura.

This gentleman has power to charter steamers or sailing vessels to take emigrants from the south ports of the United States to Brazil.

According to the contract made between the imperial government and the United States and Brazil Mail Steamship Company, he can have a delegate, and Mr. D. de Goicouria is the delegate appointed by him. I believe the government will approve what is done by the said agent.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

H. CAVALCANTI ALBUQUERQUE.

RUSSELL STURGIS, Esq.

Mr. Fiedler's inquiries developed the further facts that the owners of the steamship Marmion, acting upon the letter of the Brazilian delegation, had contracted with Mr. Goicouria, as agent of the Brazilian Government, for a voyage of the Marmion to Brazil; that such voyage had been made and concluded before the date of Mr. Fiedler's contract with Mr. Goicouria, and that the Brazilian Government had recognized Mr. Goicouria's authority to charter the Marmion by paying the money provided by the charter-party to be paid for the voyage.

Mr. Fiedler, who knew, as the world knows, the many proofs the Emperor of Brazil has given of his wisdom and justice, and the mutual friendship and goodwill that have always prevailed between the United States and Brazil, was fully justified in accepting as conclusive the foregoing evidence of Mr. Goicouria's authority to act for the Brazilian Government.

But there is further evidence of Mr. Goicouria's authority. The Brazilian Government in 1866 sent to the United States the citizen Guintino de Sonza Bocayura to encourage the expected emigration from the United States to go to Brazil. In February, 1867, the agent Bocayura advised his government, among other things, of his intention to return to Brazil, and that he had left as his representative in the United States Mr. Goicouria (the agent with whom Mr. Fiedler and the owners of the Marmion subsequently contracted). In May, 1867, the Brazilian Government acknowledged the receipt of the communication of Agent Bocayura of February, 1867, and on the 24th day of August, 1867 (three days after the date of the contract made with Mr. Fiedler), advice is sent from Rio Janeiro to Mr. Goicouria, at New York, withdrawing his authority under Bocayura's appointment. In this "aviso" is the following language: "The Imperial Government having taken sundry measures for the purpose of attracting to this country the emigration from the Southern States of the American Union and the necessity ceasing of continuing there Domingo de Goicouria to freight steamers for the transportation of such emigrants," &c., which can only be fairly construed as recognizing Mr. Goicouria as the agent of the Brazilian Government, and as including within the scope of his agency the freighting of steamers for the transportation of emigrants.

Enough appears in the evidence submitted to the committee to justify the belief that the Brazilian Government will review its decision in this matter, if this Government will bring the subject again to its attention, and will present the evidence now before the committee for its consideration. On this evidence the claim appears to be just, and your committee do not consider that the Government of Brazil has reached the conclusion that it is not just or that it can not be allowed. But Congress can not now properly legislate on this subject. At most it can only recommend that the President will again call the attention of the Brazilian Government to the justice of the claim in favor of a citizen of the United States.

In this view your committee report adversely Senate bill 741, and report the following resolution, and recommend its passage:

"Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President of the United States be requested to bring to the attention of the Emperor of Brazil the claim of Helen M. Fiedler, executrix of Ernest Fiedler, deceased, against the Government of Brazil, growing out of a contract alleged by said claimant to be obligatory on that government for the hire of the ship Circassian to transport emigrants from the United States to Brazil in the year 1867, with a view to ask said government to consider the said claim, and to provide for the allowance and payment of such sum as shall be found just to such claimant."

Translation of the copy of the report of the council of state in relation to the claim of Fiedler's executrix.

SIRE: The section of home affairs of the council of state received order from Y. I. Majesty to consult and give opinion on the following matter: "Aviso 5th, section No. 5, Rio de Janeiro, ministry of agriculture and public works, 29th August, 1873. Excellent Sir: H. M. the Emperor has been pleased to order that the section of home affairs of the council of state should consult and give opinion, Y. exc'y being reporter, on the annexed papers, relating to the reclamation presented by the legation of the United States at this court, of the representation of Ernest Fiedler, who he thinks has a right to indemnity for the contract of affreightment unfulfilled of the steamer Circassian. God guard Y. exc'y. José Fernandes da Costa Pereira, jr. To his exc'y counsellor of state Viscount de Longa Frasco."

This claim arose from the fact of the imperial government's undertaking, with the intention of causing the persons who emigrated from the United States to come to Brazil, to facilitate their means of reaching here. To that end it sent to those States the Brazilian citizen Quintino de Sonza Bocayura, for whose voyage were given the orders of the 23d and 24th July, 1866, of which minute and account is given in these papers. No written instructions, however, are found addressed to him.

Of the communications (official) between the ministry of agriculture, commerce, and public works and its agent, Bocayura, the section had before it the following papers:

First. The order (aviso) of November 25, 1866, in which, after acknowledging receipt of the officios of the 22d and 30th September and of the 19th and 22d October of that year, it is answered, as to the difficulties which he says he met with for transporting emigrants desirous of coming to this empire, and as to the doubts entertained by the president of the steamship line (receiving a subsidy from both Brazil and the United States as to the execution of the contract for transporting such emigrants), that he may authorize the transportation of such as can comply with the conditions already sent for his instruction, the imperial government defraying the amount of their necessary expense on their arrival in our country to such as can not at once pay therefor, such being held to reimburse the same in the manner required (by law).

Second. The order of the 25th January, 1867, in which, after acknowledging the receipt of the officio of 22d December, 1866 (the ministry), answers as to the instructions, for which he asks to govern him in the forwarding of emigrants, declaring "that, already by the aviso of the 25th November preceding, directed to the imperial legation in Washington (of which copy had been sent him), this ministry had taken measures by which it had authorized the embarkation of all such inhabitants of the South, who, complying with the requirements announced in the avisos of said ministry sent to said legation and of which you are advised), shall come to remain in this country, * * * and that there will be paid by the government, upon their arrival, the amount of expenses for such voyage to those emigrants who can not pay that expense immediately, on condition, however, of subsequent reimbursement.

Third. The officio of the agent Bocayura, dated Febraary 20, 1867, acknowledging receipt of the (copy) circular addressed to the presidents of provinces asking information as to the settlement and employment of emigrants, and making known that since he intended to return to this corte he had left in the United States as his representative (delegado) the American citizen Domingo de Goicouria, a respectable merchant of that city (New York), and that he had substituted him (Goicouria), during such absence, in the form of the seventh article of the contract with the United States and Brazil Mail Steamship Company.

Fourth. The aviso of the 14th of May, 1867, in answer to the foregoing officio as follows: "Superintendency of public lands and colonization, Rio de Janeiro, ministry of agriculture, &c., 14 May, 1867. I am informed of the contents of your officio of 20th of February last, reporting that you had left as your substitute in New York the merchant Domingo de Goicouria, and inclosing (copy) of the circular which you directed to the presidents of provinces, with the intention of rendering easier the directing of the American emigration thitherward. God guard you. Man'l Pento de Souza Dantas to Mr. Quintino de Sonza Bocayura."

Fifth. The aviso of the 24th of August, 1867, in which Domingo de Goicouria is discharged (dispensado) from the employment of freighting steamers, third superintendency of public lands and colonization, Rio de Janeiro, ministry of agriculture, &c., 24th of August, 1867. "The Imperial Government having taken sundry measures for the purpose of attracting to this country the emigration from the Southern States of the American Union, and the necessity ceasing of continuing there Domingo de Goicouria to freight steamers for the transportation of such emigrants, I make known to you this determination for your guidance, and in order that you may advise at once the said Goicouria that he is (released) discharged (dispensado) from said employment. God guard you. Manuel Pento de Souza Dantas. F. W. Quintino Bocayura."

From this written communication it does not appear that the authority to take up steamers was conferred, not even on the imperial legation at Washington. The power to authorize passages to emigrants is what the Imperial Government granted, and this only to the imperial legation, as appears from the aviso of the 25th January, 1867, which explains the aviso of the 25th November, 1866.

And all doubt ceases on view of the following declarations of the aviso of the 25th January, 1867: "Having thus provided for this object, and having thus facilitated the coming hither of Southern emigrants, it is proper that you, in order to make the movement more active, in the most convenient and efficacious manner should transfer as soon as possible your residence to New Orleans or to some other Southern or Western city, as may appear most advantageous to your commission, where, according to your instructions, you should give the necessary information as well to the directors (emprezarios) (or persons in charge of emigrating companies) as to the emigrants themselves who shall personally ask therefor, and also deliver passports to those who resolve to come to Brazil, should be ready to make the voyage, plainly making known to such the condition of reimbursing the advance (made for payment of passage) which has been granted in order to prevent any difficulties and reclamations like those which are now being presented by certain persons who came here in the two expeditions sent from New York."

The substitute, even if he had been named under authority from the government, or had been approved as such (which can only be claimed as a deduction from the aviso of 14th May, 1867), had no power to sign any charter-party of affreightment whether for sailing vessels or steamers. The charter-party of the steamer Circassian, signed on the 21st of August, 1867, by the substitute, Domingo de Goicouria, after the avisos of 25th November, 1866, and 25th January, 1867, was therefore unauthorized, and exceeded the authority and instructions of that substitute.

On the 21st August, 1867, the substitute, Domingo de Goicouria, signed the contract of affreightment of the steamer Circassian; on the following day he left the United States for Brazil, and the contract did not fix a term within which the steamer, which had first to make a voyage to Bremen, and then could make others that might suit, had to present herself in New Orleans; so that leaving New York on the 23d November she only arrived in New Orleans on the 6th December, having still on board freight from another port of the Union.

No passengers having offered for the voyage to Brazil, the owner of the steamer sent her elsewhere, after protesting on the 16th December against whom it concerns, and from the papers it appears that having asked advice from the chargé d'affaires ad interim (of Brazil) in Washington as to sending his steamer without passengers to Rio de Janeiro, as he stated that Cestro, the substitute appointed by Goicouria, had advised him to do, or as to considering his charter-party at an end, he chose the latter alternative.

The advice given not to dispatch his steamer without passengers, and that this fact should be made known to the government, created no obligation on any one, either on him who should thus do what he ought (uem ao que deue), nor on the imperial government.

Ernest Fiedler, owner of the Circassian, who had sent his vessel elsewhere, and whose contract of affreightment he had declared vacated (roto) in the hope of receiving $20,000 as indemnity, presented, later, his reclamation to the imperial government, the result of which appears from the letter of Mr. F. Blow (sic), copy of which is annexed to the papers presented in support of the claim.

In this letter, dated at Lisbon, November 23, 1870, the ex-minister of the United States in Brazil informs the claimant, E. Fiedler, that having examined, with the minister of foreign affairs of the empire, his claim, he was sorry to have to inform him that the answer was not favorable, because that (the answer) of the Brazilian minister was that neither Goicouria nor the party who had appointed him had authority to proceed in the manner in which they acted in the matter of the charter-party, and Mr. Blow added that it appeared "from his own convictions that under such circumstances no claim could be founded on what had been done by either." From this answer it will be seen that Mr. Blow, having examined the contract of affreightment and other papers, was convinced that no right of claim could be founded on them, or, what is the same thing, that the claim had no legal right to support it, but still might be maintained in equity, as in other cases, and for this reason he closes his letter, saying: "Now, my dear sir, if you are able to prove that contracts made by either were ever allowed, and the money paid by the Brazilian Government for same, or on account for same, I am convinced I can obtain from the imperial government the sum you desire to receive; nevertheless I am not certain that you could obtain these proofs from ship-owners in New York through the person who acted as consul of the Brazilian Government at the time of Goicouria' contract.

This abandonment of the charter-party as a decisive document, which it would be if the contractor, Goicouria, had authority to make the contract; this reference to contracts in general without distinguishing between those authorized and those made without authority; this guarded or strict mode of expression whenever he states a proposition in which he has entire confidence; and, finally, his recourse to analogy, which is not required to prove strict right, as well as the lessened sum demanded, all go to show that the enlightened judgment of Mr. Blow made him recognize at once that this claim had no foundation in right.

This high judgment also shows itself in the memorandum of the present minister of the United States, when, having mentioned that the representative of Fiedler claims now the sum of $42,000 as indemnity for breaking the contract, besides the expenses, closed his demand thus: "This last (the representative) has certainly right to a reasonable compensation for the disappointment and final failure of the voyage, through no fault of his, but at the request of the Brazilian representative, and the claimant is also entitled to reimbursement for all moneys expended for outfit, &c.

Thus, as Mr. Blow had thought that the sum which Ernest Fiedler claimed of $20,000 was as much as could be had, the present minister of the United States does not support, in the conclusion of his memorandum, more than what may be a reasonable compensation.

The charter-party, if it is valid and obligatory upon the imperial government, calls for a fixed sum in conformity with law. The demand sustained in the memorandum looks to recourse to the sense of equity of the Brazilian Government; that it shall do in this case as it has done in others. The reasons which the memorandum presents as supporting the claim are:

First. That the steamer Circassian was taken up on freight by Domingo de Goicouria, emigrant agent of the Brazilian Government, whose authority so to take up steamers is deduced from the letter of Mr. Cavalcanti de Albuquerque, in which he states that the emigration agent was Mr. Quintino de Sonza Bocayura, who was authorized to appoint a substitute, and that Mr. Domingo de Goicouria was the substitute named by him.

Second. That the Circassian thus chartered was placed at the orders of the emigration agent from the 6th day of December, 1867, when she arrived at New Orleans, until the 16th.

Third. That, no passengers being forthcoming, the owner, Ernest Fiedler, addressed himself to the chargé d'affaires of Brazil in Washington, Mr. Padua Fleury, who when informed warned (preveniû) him (Fiedler) that the ship ought not to undertake to go to Rio de Janeiro, and that he (Fleury) would make the representations to the imperial government proper to be made in order to come to an agreement.

Fourth. That with this assurance the owner, Ernest Fiedler, gave up the voyage, and withdrew therefrom ("withdrew the vessel from the projected voyage," says the statement of Messrs. Jordan and Whitney), after having spent more than $20,000 in her fitting out.

The section will observe that the first reason admits that the charter-party was insufficient as an obligatory instrument, seeing that further proofs are wanting of the competency of the party signing in the name of the Brazilian Government. Mr. Blow also admitted the insufficiency of this authorization, since he advised the collection of proofs of the acceptance of the contract and its approval afterward.

These difficulties would have been prevented if the owner had exacted the power of attorney or other regular document showing the extent of the agent's authority, as is done by every merchant who treats with an agent professing to act for a third party.

The letter of Mr. Cavalcanti de Albuquerque affirms it is true that Mr. Bocayura was the Brazilian emigration agent, with powers to take up steamers, but it does not affirm that Domingo de Goicouria held the same authority.

In the declaration of the validity of powers Mr. Cavalcanti was inexact; the avisos of the 25th November, 1866, and of 25th January, 1867, would have given him a different opinion if he had consulted them. In any event the chargé d'affaires of the empire was not the proper person to appear as the informant in this matter, nor does the information which he gave suffice to supply the powers always demanded in the course of commercial undertakings for contracts of affreightment made in behalf of a third party.

The second reason does not supply the requirement of law violated in the contract, and in order that it may avail as a reason for equity, it would be still necessary that there should not exist in this contract the extraordinary circumstance of not naming a time within which the steamer should arrive in New Orleans, in order to afford the opportunity for the execution of the intentions which the new policy of the Federal Government caused rapidly to diminish.

The steamer being chartered on the 21st of August with liberty first to make a long voyage to Bremen, and after that again to carry a cargo from New York to an intermediate port, and thence again to New Orleans, where she arrived in fifteen days after leaving New York, none of the charges for damages caused in voyages made for account of Mr. E. Fiedler, none of the outfit for any time previous to her arrival in New Orleans to receive passengers there, can be brought into the account for a voyage to Rio de Janeiro, and not even if the obligation of affreightment were in due form and legal.

Third. It is true that the steamer did not obtain, in the port of New Orleans, the passengers on which she had reckoned, and in case of a lawful charter-party she would have a right to consider the charter-party concluded or to make the voyage without passengers at the expense of the hirer.

This right, however, can not be sustained by the owner-claimant in this case, resting on a private letter not at all obligatory (i. e., creating no obligations) on the nominal hirer, as has been shown. It was because he was convinced of the untenability of this unsustainable position that the owner, Fiedler, addressed himself to the Brazilian chargé d'affaires, hoping to find in his answer a reason for involving the Brazilian legation in the contract, and which up to that time had not been heard of in the contract, or from, in respect to it.

That answer, however, conferred no new rights upon him, and the Brazilian chargé, in advising the owner not to make the voyage to Rio without passengers, only gave his own opinion, not at all obligatory on the owner, and of which he availed himself and with reason, for he well understood that the voyage to Rio de Janeiro would only cause him loss.

He had already gained by freighting his vessel, up to that time employed on his account, with the exception only of a few days, during which he had been waiting in New Orleans ready to receive passengers for Brazil. The suggestion attributed to Cestro, that he would lose nothing, and he might hope to gain, by the voyage to Rio, the sum agreed on, he ought to have disregarded, as he did in his own interest, what right could accrue to him by that? None at all.

There is the promise of Brazilian chargé to make representations to the imperial government, on which it is said the owner relied. From the answer it will be seen that the advice was that the owner should consider as completely vacated the charter party, and should not dispatch his vessel to Rio de Janeiro without passengers, adding the following words: "Of all that has taken place I will immediately make report to my government, calling its attention to this matter, and asking that it take into consideration the account presented by you as an indemnity for the injury and damages occasioned." This answer is not at all obligatory for the imperial government, and Mr. E. Fiedler had therein only one reason more for counting on the justice and right due to him.

In what, however, did the owner expend the $20,000, and what is the outfit for which he claims? The expense for the voyage to Bremen, and the repairs for damage suffered in that voyage, which he declares was stormy, can be in no way, and by no one, charged or imputed to the hirer for a voyage to Rio de Janeiro, and the expenses also for or at the intermediate port for which the Circassian took cargo for New York, and thence to New Orleans, for which port, it is said, she also carried cargo.

The gains or the losses of those voyages are entirely for account of the owner of the vessel. The memorandum supports this opinion when it states that the Circassian was at the orders of the hirer from the 6th day of December.

Again, as a last resource, the freighting of the steamer Catherine Whiting is brought up as an example, which was taken up in New York on 28th May, 1867, the owner letting her being N. B. Starbuck, and the hirer on the part of Brazil the same Domingo de Goicouria, and the fact that the imperial government having paid the price agreed on in the contract. It is required, however, to observe that steamer taken up on the 28th May obliged herself to proceed immediately on the 1st June to New Orleans, and on the 19th of said month left for Rio de Janeiro, where she arrived on the 6th of August, having disembarked in Pará the emigrants she brought for that province, and having touched in Bahia for provisions and coal.

The payment of the freight in that case was in consequence, not of the recognition of the validity of the charter-party, but of a service actually performed, which the imperial government never omits to pay.

The government had authorized the forwarding of emigrants, obliging itself to pay or advance for the payment of the passage-money on their arrival in this empire, and it fulfilled that obligation; this contract of affreightment, not authorized and not performed as that was in all its parts, has no analogy thereto or parity therewith to justify this reclamation. In fine, the section is of opinion—

First. That the charter-party of the Circassian is not valid, and in no way obligatory on the imperial government.

Second. That in consequence, by strict right, the national treasury is not bound for the payment of any sum whatever.

Third. That as to the damage occasioned to the owner, the claimant here, it must be of small amount, limited, as has been shown, to the delay of some few days, during which she was ready to take on board passengers in the port of New Orleans to carry them to Brazil.

Fourth. That any indemnity due the claimant should demand of the party who without due authority signed the contract, and of the party who being substituted in New York (Cestro) attempted to put life into a void contract.

Let them discuss among themselves the honesty and good faith in which they engaged themselves to the observance of this undertaking.

Fifth. That if the imperial government shall decide in its own judgment (ensa-sabidoria) that the letter of the 5th March, 1867 (original 1857), written by the chargé d'affaires ad interim, W. A. Cavalcanti de Albuquerque, can have led in error the owner of the Circassian to make his contract in good faith and to incur those expenses which by mere equity may be properly reimbursed, the compensation in that case should not exceed some hundreds of dollars, because the expenses referred to were occasioned by the voyage to Bremen, or were caused thereby, and the owner was thus reduced to offer an insufficient vessel, charged with all the expenses for repairs in a previous voyage made for his benefit and for his advantage, as was that to Bremen, and in like manner with those incurred during the voyage to an intermediate port, taking fifteen days to reach New Orleans (from New York), where only as late as the 6th December he alleges that he placed his vessel at the orders of the supposed hirer.

The expenses of those days of the ten elapsed between his arrival at New Orleans and the day when, having completed his discharge, he was in a condition to receive passengers for Rio de Janerio, ought to be reckoned to account of the owner.

The expected profits of the voyage, besides being properly lost to the owner from his act of withdrawal of his vessel from said voyage, can not in any way be computed at more than a reasonable percentage upon the $42,000 named in the contract; all these items together would be far below the $20,000 claimed.

Your imperial majesty will decide with your accustomed enlightenment (sabedoria).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me that this is not a very good practice. This seems to be an ordinary case of a claim upon a contract made by the Brazilian Government, or claimed to have been made, which the emperor has referred to a commission or other tribunal appointed by him, who have reported that there is no liability of that government to this claimant. That happened eleven years ago. The claim originated some seventeen or eighteen years ago.

It is the practice of the executive department, of its own accord, without any such action from the Senate or House of Representatives, to call the attention of foreign governments to such claims of American citizens as seem to it to be valid and to require such interposition. It seems to me that for the Senate to undertake in the very vast number of such matters to make these investigations and then pass a resolution, which amounts to a judgment of condemnation on the Department of State, is very bad practice. But as the rejection of the resolution now, it having been reported by the committee and being before the Senate, might perhaps operate adversely to the claimant and might be construed into an expression of opinion by the Senate that the claim is not valid and that the Department ought not to interfere, I will withdraw my objection. However, I trust the Committee on Foreign Relations will see that, whatever precedents there may be, of which I suspect there are very few, this may not be an example for further measures of this kind.

Mr. CONGER. I think the report by the officials of the Brazilian Government who examined this claim is conclusive and satisfactory to the mind of any one that the claim should not be further pressed by the Government of the United States on the consideration of that nation. I have read very carefully the translation of the report of the council of state in relation to the claim of the executrix, and I must say that it does not present to my mind even an equitable claim to be presented by this resolution to the Brazilian Government for a rehearing. It has been carefully considered by the authorities of the United States in presenting it from time to time, and I can not see by what right or by what authority the Government should undertake to make this a national question, and present through the President of the United States this matter again to the consideration of the Brazilian Government.

The report itself fails almost entirely to make out a case which the government should settle. There is nothing even to show that Mr. Fiedler was a citizen of the United States or had any claim upon this Government as a citizen in presenting a claim against another government. There is an inference that he was a citizen or an allusion which might make that seem apparent, but there is nothing asserted and nothing to show that the Government has any such relation to Mr. Fiedler, and therefore to the executrix, as would warrant us in acting upon a claim of this kind. It seems to me it is a very loose claim, and it is hardly worthy of the dignity of the United States to make it a national question.

Mr. MILLER, of California. This resolution was reported by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] who is not in the Senate this morning, and I have been unable to find him. He is perfectly familiar with the whole subject and has gone through the case with great care. I think it is a courtesy due the Senator from Alabama to lay the resolution over. The committee were of opinion that there was foundation for the claim.

Mr. COCKRELL. I see no necessity for delaying action upon the resolution. I think the Senate is ready to act upon it. The report has been read.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. VEST. I introduced the original bill, and it will be noticed that in the report of the committee they recommend to the Senate the rejection of the bill which I introduced and the adoption of this resolution instead of it. A joint resolution passed the Senate at the last session and went to the House, but was not acted upon, and this is simply a Senate resolution.

The whole of the resolution from beginning to end (which is not at all satisfactory to me) simply amounts to this: that the Government of Brazil is asked for a new hearing upon this case. It does not commit this Government to anything in regard to the matter. It simply asks that a citizen of the United States shall be heard again upon evidence which the committee say in their report was not sufficiently considered, in their judgment, by the Brazilian Government at the time of the rejection of the claim. No injustice can be done to anybody; no foreign complication can arise in regard to it. It does not go as far as I should like to go, but I am very willing to accept the action of the committee in order to dispose of the matter, and I hope the Senate will adopt the resolution.

Mr. MILLER, of California. That is all there is of it, as the Senator from Missouri has stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question on agreeing to the resolution, and declared that the ayes appeared to prevail.

Mr. CONGER. I ask for a division.

The ayes were 30.

Mr. CONGER. I do not insist on a further count.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is "given up," and the resolution is agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I do not "give up," but I withdraw the call.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not understand the Senator.

Mr. CONGER. I say I do not give up the point, but I withdraw the call.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will again put the question.

Mr. CONGER. I say I withdraw the call for a division, but I have my own private opinion still.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair used the common parlance of the Senate. The division was "given up," in the phrase of the Senate.

Mr. CONGER. All right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

DEPREDATIONS OF UTE INDIANS.

The bill (S. 851) to provide for the payment of ten claims for depredations committed by the Ute Indians at the time of the massacre at the White River agency in 1879 was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RAILROAD IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

The bill (S. 908) to grant a right of way through the Indian Territory to the Southern Kansas Railway Company, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. VEST. That bill can not be considered under the five-minute rule. It involves the very same principle and brings up the same question with other bills on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

FLORIDA INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

The bill (S. 230) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to settle the claim of the State of Florida on account of expenditures made in suppressing Indian hostilities was announced as next in order.

Mr. HAMPTON. I beg to ask that that bill be passed over without prejudice, as the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES] who introduced it is not present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina asks that this bill be passed over, retaining its place at the head of the Calendar under Rule VIII. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

WILLIAM M. MAYNADIER.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 300) for the relief of Maj. William M. Maynadier, a paymaster in the United States Army. It provides for the payment to William M. Maynadier of $3,726.50, the amount paid by him into the Treasury in liquidation of a deficiency in his accounts as paymaster at Prescott, Ariz., caused by robbery committed by his clerk, D. D. Chandler, at Prescott, April 3, 1876, as shown by the finding and report of a board of inquiry appointed by General Kautz, commanding that military department, to investigate the circumstances of the loss; and also the further sum of $100 paid by Maynadier for the arrest of Chandler, the restoration of both sums having been recommended by the board of inquiry.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. HAMPTON February 5, 1884:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 300) for the relief of Maj. William M. Maynadier, paymaster in the United States Army, having considered the same, make the following report:

The committee find the facts to be as stated in Senate Report No. 78, Forty-seventh Congress, first session, which said report is hereto annexed and made part of this report, and is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 78, Forty-seventh Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 254) for the relief of Maj. William M. Maynadier, paymaster, United States Army, having considered the same and accompanying papers, submit the following report:

That under date of January 17, 1882, your committee called on the Secretary of War for a copy of the proceedings of a board of officers convened at headquarters Department of Arizona, November 17, 1876, pursuant to Special Order No. 138, dated headquarters department of Arizona, November 6, 1876, to examine and report upon the loss of public funds, for which Maj. William M. Maynadier, paymaster, United States Army, is responsible, reported to have been stolen from his office safe by an absconding clerk; which record is now on file in the committee-room of the Committee on Military Affairs of the United States Senate. Your committee find the facts to be as stated in the finding of the board, which said finding is hereto annexed and made part of this report, and is as follows:

"In conclusion the board find that Major Maynadier was on duty by proper authority as paymaster at Prescott, Ariz.; that he was duly authorized and required to keep public money in a safe provided for the purpose, there being no depository available; that he did so keep public money, though not in excess of what the service at his station required; that the safe provided for him was a large fire and burglar proof one, manufactured by Jonathan Kitridge, of San Francisco, having two combination locks, the outer one being T. E. Burwell's and the inner one 'Young's rotary combination;' that Major Maynadier never made known these combinations; that said safe appears to be a good and secure one; that the clerk, D. D. Chandler, was well recommended and apparently capable and trustworthy; that on March 31, 1876, Major Maynadier had in his safe what under a customarily careful count appeared to be $4,081.11; but there should have been $4,228.46; that on Monday, April 3, 1876, he found in his safe only $211.46, the balance, $4,017, having been stolen by Chandler, who afterwards returned $290.50; leaving the amount actually lost by Major Maynadier $3,726.50.

"The following tabular statement will show more briefly the exact state of the case:

|---|---|
| Amount shown as on hand by statement of April 1, 1876 | $4,081 11 |
| Amount received in March, 1876, but not reported until May (effects of deceased soldier) | 147 35 |
| True amount for which Major Maynadier was responsible | 4,228 46 |
| Amount found in safe after burglary | 211 46 |
| Total amount stolen | 4,017 00 |
| Amount returned by Chandler upon his arrest | 290 50 |
| Amount actually lost | 3,726 50 |

"Under instructions of the Paymaster-General, Major Maynadier has refunded the amount lost, but so far as the board can ascertain it believes Major Maynadier exercised due care in the keeping of the public money intrusted to him, and therefore recommends that he be relieved from responsibility for the loss of the $3,726.50, and that this amount, increased by the $100 paid by Major Maynadier for the arrest of Chandler, making a total of $3,826.50, be restored to Maj. W. M. Maynadier, paymaster, United States Army.

"There being no further business before it, the board adjourned sine die.

"RODNEY SMITH,
"Major and Paymaster, U. S. A., President.
"C. A. REYNOLDS,
"Major and Quartermaster, U. S. A., Member.
"JOHN SIMPSON,
Captain and Assistant Quartermaster, U. S. A., Recorder."

The finding of the court of inquiry is approved by the commanding general Department of Arizona and the Paymaster-General of the Army.

Upon these facts your committee believe that Maynadier is entitled to relief. Therefore Senate bill No. 254 is reported back with recommendation that it pass.

The committee, therefore, adopt said Senate report as the report of this committee, and report the accompanying bill for his relief, with recommendation that it pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS J. MILLER.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 421) for the relief of Thomas J. Miller, of Washington Territory. It proposes to direct the Secretary of War to examine into and ascertain the loss and damage sustained by Thomas J. Miller, a citizen of Washington Territory, by the seizure and sinking of his ferry-boat on the Columbia River by the armed forces of the United States, for the purpose of preventing the same being used by the hostile Indians during the late Bannock war in that Territory, in or about the month of July, 1878. The sum of $500 is appropriated to enable the Secretary of War to adjust and the accounting officers of the Treasury to pay the amount of the loss and damage so allowed.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). There is no report accompanying the bill, the Chair is informed by the Secretary.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARTHA VAUGHN AND LOUISA JACKMAN.

The bill (S. 36) for the relief of Mrs. Martha Vaughn and Mrs. Louisa Jackman was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Mrs. Martha Vaughn of $2,500, and to the legal representatives of Mrs. Louisa Jackman of $2,500, for patriotic services, hazards, and losses incurred by Martha Vaughn and Louisa Jackman in conveying information of great value to the Union officers in the State of Kentucky in March, 1863.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CONGER. The title should be amended to correspond with the bill by inserting "the legal representatives of" before "Mrs. Louisa Jackman."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the title will be so amended.

CHARLES P. CHOUTEAU.

The bill (S. 371) for the relief of Charles P. Chouteau was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Court of Claims be authorized to grant a rehearing in the case of Charles P. Chouteau, surviving partner of Chouteau, Harrison & Valle, and William A. Steele, against the United States, with jurisdiction to hear and determine the amount, if any, due under the contract for the construction of the iron-clad vessel Etlah, by reason of the delays occasioned in such construction by the acts of the Government beyond the period specified in the contract or for extras beyond what was provided therein. If upon such rehearing a receipt dated April 24, 1866, shall be given in evidence, the court may give judgment for such sum as shall be justly and equitably due notwithstanding such receipt.

Mr. GARLAND. What is the cause for the rehearing?

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps it will be more convenient to the Senate, instead of having the report read at length, to have me answer the Senator's question in the first place.

This is one of a pretty large number of contracts which were made by the United States early in the war for building iron-clad vessels. The style of vessels was almost wholly unknown in the experience of mankind, and entirely unknown in the experience of the United States until that time; and the process of construction was itself a constant process of invention, constant changes and improvements being made by the United States and the builders as the building went along. The United States reserved in the contract a right to order any changes whatever in the size, shape, or construction of the vessel or its engines or motive power, and further reserved the right, if the contractor did not carry out his contract, to take possession of his manufacturing establishment under the military power and complete the work itself.

In the course of the execution of this contract by the contractors the United States made several very large changes. It was as if a man who had contracted originally to build a one-story cottage for the habitation of a man and his wife without children had had the contract changed as it went along into a New York city hotel, almost. That is a little exaggerated illustration, but not much.

These contractors were compelled not only to perform all this extra work occasioned by the new inventions and ideas that came into the heads of the engineers and draughtsmen in the Navy Department, but they were compelled to delay very largely for a long time the completion of the work by reason of these acts of the United States solely, and that was at a time when labor and material were fluctuating in price and increasing in price with the rapid fluctuations of the value of currency in its proportion to gold at that period of the war.

The contractors had a right, which they exercised, to go into the Court of Claims to get two things: First, the price of the extra work the new work, which the United States was of course bound to pay, the changes and additions to the work; second, for the loss or injury which was caused them in the execution of so much of the work as was embraced and included in the original contract by reason of the enforced delay, without their fault but in pursuance of the exertion of its right by the United States, in the time of completing the contract. These parties went into the Court of Claims, and just at the close of the trial they were met by a receipt acknowledging payment for their contract price and their extra work. They had given authority to a New York banker to receive the payment of the money as it fell due; and when the final payment fell due they gave the receipt which was brought forward in the Court of Claims, and which was held by that court to cut off this particular claim for the increase of material and labor in the original work.

It appeared that the authority given to the New York banker had been merely an authority to receive the money as it was paid, without any thought on the part of the contractors that they were authorizing an agent to cut off the rest of their claim; and it was accepted by the agent of the United States without any expectation on his part that he was cutting off these contractors from an opportunity to have in some proper place this claim which I mention enforced. This bill authorizes these contractors to go into the Court of Claims and to have the case considered notwithstanding that receipt. When the receipt was produced, which was at the close of the trial, the counsel for the contractors was so confident that it did not cut off this portion of the claim that he went on with his case. Instead of asking time either to come to Congress for relief before a decree, or to show that the New York person was not duly authorized to give a receipt in that form, or to have some equitable process for revising it or whatever he might be advised to do, he went on with his case, and the court held, as I said, that the receipt cut off this claim.

There have been a considerable number of like cases in which Congress has granted the relief which these parties ask in this case; that is, that the Court of Claims may rehear it and determine it on its substantial justice notwithstanding this receipt.

Mr. COCKRELL. This claim passed at the last session of Congress.

Mr. HOAR. This claim passed the Senate, I think unanimously, but at any rate after a statement like the one I am making now.

Without questioning the policy of strictly holding parties to the limitation provided by law and of strictly holding parties to abide on their part the judgment of this court which we have provided against them, it seemed to the committee that this was a peculiar class of case where those principles should not be rigidly enforced. It was in substance a contract by these contractors with the United States to do in the business which they were engaged in just what the Government should order, and they were exposing themselves to this risk of the constant change of plan and great delay in the execution of the work. As I said, in all the cases which are of that kind that have been before the Senate for its action the Senate has done what is here proposed. There were four of these vessels—the Senator from Missouri perhaps can correct me if I state the facts wrong—and the constructors of the others have had a similar relief to this which is asked. This is the last of that class.

There is another case which is a good deal like this in some of its essential characteristics, where the committee at the present session have denied the party relief like this. It seemed to be distinguishable—it is not necessary to go into that—but the committee were very doubtful about that, and after one adverse report they gave special direction to have a hearing of the counsel of the contracting party before they should finally report on the case; but with that exception I believe this is the last of that class of cases.

There is a case in England, to which my attention was called, where the English Government made a similar contract and where the party came in and simply said he had lost £40,000 by the contract for one of their government vessels, and the board of admiralty ordered to be paid the actual sum, of their own motion, notwithstanding the contract.

Mr. GARLAND. I would ask the Senator before he takes his seat if the facts show that the claimants made a motion for a new trial? It seems that this receipt they encountered on the trial was a matter of surprise.

Mr. HOAR. They did not; and whether they could upon a new trial have satisfied the court that the New York agent had not authority as between them and the United States to receive the money and sign this receipt, I am not sure.

Mr. GARLAND. I would ask another question. What is the showing of facts here that they can possibly overcome or avoid that receipt in any way on another trial?

Mr. HOAR. This statute leaves to the Court of Claims the power to deal with the question on its merits according to substantial justice.

Mr. GARLAND. I am not opposing the theory of the bill, for I have generally liberal views on such subjects.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose the Court of Claims would say on the facts which were before the committee that here was a receipt on a written contract entered into by both parties to it, given unadvisedly, and it would be the exercise of what in ordinary courts of equity would be the power to reform a written contract which does not express the true intent of the parties.

Mr. GARLAND. Was an appeal taken by the claimants to the Supreme Court?

Mr. HOAR. I think an appeal was taken in this case to the Supreme Court. It was in one of the cases, and I think in this, and the decision of the Court of Claims affirmed.

Mr. GARLAND. I have no particular objection to the bill; but I would suggest, as the general act organizing the Court of Claims does not give the right of appeal in all cases, that a provision should be here inserted that there shall be a right of appeal to both parties as in other cases.

Mr. HOAR. Very well; I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Arkansas suggest where that amendment shall come in?

Mr. GARLAND. At the end of the bill.

Mr. HOAR. I am quite sure, with my knowledge of the opinions of the authorities now representing the United States Government, there would be no appeal against the claimant, so that the insertion of the clause would be in favor of the claimant. Still there is no harm in reserving the power.

Mr. GARLAND. At the end of the bill I move to insert "with the right of appeal as in other cases to the Supreme Court of the United States."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MONEY ADVANCED BY GEORGIA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 595) to repay the State of Georgia $27,175.50, money advanced by said State for the defense of her frontiers against the Indians from 1795 to 1818, and not heretofore repaid.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to audit the claims of the State of Georgia for moneys advanced by said State to pay troops ordered into service for the defense of her frontiers against the Indians from 1795 to 1818, inclusive, and not heretofore repaid to said State; and to pay to said State such sum, not exceeding $22,567.42, as he shall find due and unpaid, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That if there be any sums of money due or owing to the United States by the State of Georgia, whatever amount, if any, may be found due under the provisions of this act to the State of Georgia shall be credited to that State, and the balance only shall be paid by the State of Georgia or the United States, as shall appear by the striking of a balance to be due from the one party or the other.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I move to strike out the proviso reported by the committee.

This is the case really: A former comptroller of the Treasury, in making up the accounts between the Government of the United States and the different States, charged each Southern State with what is known as the war tax. The State of Georgia never has assumed that war tax as a debt of the State. I do not think the people of the United States intend that it shall be so; but if they determine to collect it, then let Congress pass a bill ordering that it shall be collected, and there is no doubt that the State of Georgia will assume, for her citizens, the debt and pay it; but we do not think it ought to be disposed of in this way. Here are amounts of money that the committee admit are due to the State of Georgia, and the proposition is to pay it back. Now, we protest that the war tax ought not to be charged against the State of Georgia until the like treatment is in store for all the Southern States. We ought to be treated alike on the question, and it seems to me that in this case, as in cases heretofore, the amount due the State should be paid out of the Treasury. When the Government of the United States desires the war tax paid by all the Southern States, then let it say so, and Georgia will assume it and pay it, and not have it collected by a tax on the lands of her citizens. Our Legislature in 1866, if I recollect correctly, passed a resolution, supposing it would have to be paid, proposing to the United States Government to assume it as a debt and pay it; but the proposition was never agreed to by Congress or any one having authority as an officer of the United States and it was not assumed as a debt of the State, and it certainly is not now a debt of the State. We are ready to assume it if it has to be paid, but we do not want the charge to be made in this way, as all the States should be treated alike.

I believe there are two or three cases where there have been amounts awarded to the State of Georgia since the war on previous claims, one in reference to the Western and Atlantic Railroad that occurred after the war. These have not been credited, nor was this question raised until it was raised on a small appropriation made at the last session to pay a debt due the State of Georgia. I trust there will be no objection to striking out this proviso and permitting the claim to be paid as others have been, and let the question as to the war tax be settled hereafter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] to the amendment of the Committee on Claims. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out, beginning in line 12, the following proviso:

Provided, That if there be any sums of money due or owing to the United States by the State of Georgia, whatever amount, if any, may be found due under the provisions of this act to the State of Georgia shall be credited to that State, and the balance only shall be paid by the State of Georgia or the United States, as shall appear by the striking of a balance to be due from the one party or the other.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I do not know and the committee did not know whether there is any war debt due from the State of Georgia to the United States or not. I do not think that the war tax, as it is called, unless it has been assumed by the State of Georgia, is a debt due from the State to the United States. It is true that a certain amount of war tax was assigned to the State of Georgia by the General Government, but that did not make it a debt due from the State. It was a tax which might have been levied upon and collected from the citizens or the property of the citizens of the State, but was not a debt due from the State, so that if the State of Georgia has not assumed the war tax, so called, I take it that this amount can not be offset as against that tax or any portion of that tax. But if there be a debt now due by the State of Georgia to the United States, I think the Senator from Georgia will agree that this amount ought to be offset against that debt.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator will permit me a moment. I will state that I do agree with him fully on that, if there is any such debt. If instead of striking out the proviso we should make this amendment in line 14, after the word "Georgia," to add "other than the war tax;" so as to read, "provided that if there be any sums of money due or owing to the United States by the State of Georgia other than the war tax, whatever amount, if any," &c., it would be satisfactory.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. If the Senator from Georgia thinks that is necessary I shall not object to it.

Mr. BROWN. I do, for this reason: you admit that the war tax is not a debt against the State of Georgia, but there was a small amount appropriated at the last session of Congress in payment for a claim of the State of Georgia; but the Comptroller of the Treasury has refused to pay it, because he finds that the war tax by a predecessor of his is charged on the books against Georgia, and the amount is now withheld on that very question. That is the reason I suggest the amendment, which will stand as the sense of the Senate. I wish the Comptroller of the Treasury to know that the Senate decides that the direct tax, known as the war tax, is not a debt of any State which has not assumed it. I am sure the Senator is right that there is no debt due by the State of Georgia, as a corporate body or a State, to the United States. I admit the United States does have the right to go into Georgia and levy and collect a direct tax; and whenever it is the policy of the United States to do so, the State of Georgia will assume it for her citizens and pay it.

Probably the last amendment would better suit the views of the Senator. If there is anything other than the war tax due by the State let it be included in the settlement.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Wisconsin is clearly right that there is no debt against any Southern State in consequence of the direct tax assessed on the people of the State during the war; but the Treasury Department has not so construed the law. There is a fund, I know, coming to the State of Alabama on two accounts, one on account of arms and munitions of war under the militia act, another on account of proceeds of the sales of public lands, 5 per cent. of the proceeds of sales of public lands, which we thought we were entitled to receive from the Government, but on application made the Comptroller of the Treasury, taking the ground suggested by the Senator from Georgia, insists that the State of Alabama is indebted to the Government upon the war tax, and placed this fund as it accumulates in the Treasury from sales of the public lands to the credit of the war debt.

I should be very glad, indeed, to have some declaration by Congress which would reverse the decision of the Treasury Department. The Comptroller of the Treasury feels himself, I believe, obligated to follow out the decision made by his predecessor upon this question. There seems to be no rule there but stare decisis—if you make a wrong decision it is better to stick to it; that is the rule in the Treasury Department.

I should be very glad indeed if we could get some general expression from Senators here in regard to this very plain and palpable proposition that there is no debt against these States until they have assumed it, and I take it for granted that the Government of the United States will not undertake to compel the States of the South to assume that debt. I do not care to go into the argument of it now by any means, but I hope that the amendment that the Senator from Georgia wishes to put in the proviso will prevail.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Georgia as modifying his first amendment?

Mr. BROWN. At the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin I will propose my amendment after the word "any," at the end of line 14, instead of after "Georgia," in line 14.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment as modified by the Senator from Georgia will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of line 14, after the word "any," it is proposed to insert "other than the war tax;" so as to read:

Provided, That if there be any sums of money due or owing to the United States by the State of Georgia, whatever amount, if any, other than the war tax, may be found due under the provisions of this act to the State of Georgia shall be credited to that State, and the balance only shall be paid by the State of Georgia or the United States as shall appear by the striking of a balance to be due from the one party or the other.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest to the Senator from Georgia, would it not be better to say "the direct tax?" That is the way it is known in legislation.

Mr. BROWN. That would be better probably.

Mr. HOAR. I think I would put it in a different way, if the Senator pleases—at the end of the proviso the words "that not being herein intended to include any tax assessed against said State not assumed by the State;" because if you speak of a debt other than war tax it is an implication that you consider the war tax a debt.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator is right. I accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts as better than that I proposed, and I prefer his language.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The Senator from Massachusetts will state his amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts will please submit to the Secretary the exact phraseology of his amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I propose to add to the amendment:

The above provision not being intended to include any direct tax which has not been assumed by said State.

Mr. BROWN. That is correct; I accept that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on this amendment to the amendment reported by the Committee on Claims.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BROWN. The title ought to be amended. We did not make good the whole claim. We only make good $22,567.42.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the title will be modified to conform to the provisions of the bill as to the amount, and as so modified the title will stand.

THOMAS JONES.

The bill (S. 273) for the relief of the estate of Thomas Jones, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments: In line 7, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$18,007.79" and insert "$9,000;" and in line 9, after the word "for," to strike out "1,800,779" and insert "a quantity of;" so as to make the bill read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to W. W. McDowell, as administrator of the estate of Thomas Jones, deceased, late of Memphis, Tenn., the sum of $9,000, the same being in full for a quantity of brick taken from said Thomas Jones, at or near the city of Memphis, in the year 1862, by order of Maj. Gen. W. T. Sherman, and used in the construction of magazines, quarters, and for general camp purposes.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. Is there any written report in this case?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is.

Mr. CULLOM. Let it be read. This involves a large sum of money.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. GEORGE February 6, 1884:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the claim of the administrator of Thomas Jones, deceased, beg leave to submit the following report:

The claim was fully considered by the committee at the last Congress, and a report made recommending that the sum of $9,000 be allowed the claimant. This report we now adopt.

"[Report to accompany bill S. 1448.]

"The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1448) for the relief of the estate of Thomas Jones, deceased, have considered the same, and respectfully report:

"Thomas Jones, the intestate of the claimant, was a citizen of Memphis, Tenn., in 1862, when the Federal forces took possession of that city. The proof is conclusive that he was throughout the war loyal to the United States.

"He was the owner of a large number of brick, then in kiln. These brick were needed by the United States for building magazines, cisterns, fortifications, and chimneys of the barracks and hospitals. A large number were taken for this purpose and so used. What the exact number was it is impossible now to ascertain. This claim is for 1,800,779, and there is the proof of three or four witnesses, certified to be reputable, to the amount.

"J. C. Dougherty, special agent of the Quartermaster's Department, was sent to Memphis in 1873 to examine the claim. After a thorough examination, he reported that the number taken was equal to the number claimed. He reported, however, that it was impossible to estimate how many of those bricks were taken by the Quartermaster's Department and how many by the engineers. On this ground the Quartermaster's Department refused to allow any part of the claim, recommending application to Congress.

"The mistake of Jones, in his lifetime, was always to apply to the Quartermaster's Department and not to the engineers. He applied to General Sherman at the time, who it appears indorsed on his application that the claim could not be paid till the end of the war, like all other claims, according to the circumstances of each case.

"There is proof of the sale of these brick by the Quartermaster's Department after the war, and there is also proof tending to show that they were less in number than the amount claimed and reported to be correct by Dougherty. It is impossible now to fix the exact number. It appears, on the whole, that 1,500,000 would not be far from right, and is most probably the nearest approximation that can now be made to justice. This claim is for $10 per thousand. We think this charge too high. It appears that Jones gave $6 per thousand for them. We therefore recommend that he be paid that price for 1,500,000—say $9,000, and we recommend the passage of the bill amended so as to allow that much."

The bill claims $18,007.79.

We recommend that the bill pass, after being amended as follows:

Strike out in lines 7 and 8 the words "eighteen thousand and seven dollars and seventy-nine cents," and insert in lieu thereof "nine thousand dollars," strike out in lines 8, 9, and 10 "one million eight hundred thousand seven hundred and seventy-nine," and insert a "quantity of."

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SALARIES OF ARMY CHAPLAINS.

The bill (S. 469) to increase the salaries and pay of the chaplains in the Army was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is an adverse report in that case.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest to the Senator from Missouri whether it would not be just as well to move to indefinitely postpone the bill and get it off the Calendar.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope that will be done. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Missouri to object to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. No; I do not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa moves that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN M. ROBESON.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 372) for the relief of Frances A. Robinson, administratrix of the estate of John M. Robinson.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, in line 6 before the word "thousand" to strike out "three" and insert "one," and at the end of the bill to add the following proviso:

Provided, That the said sum be paid to the legal representatives of said John M. Robinson.

So as to make the bill read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Frances A. Robinson, administratrix of John M. Robinson, deceased, the sum of $1,000, which will be in full satisfaction of all claims of said administratrix and of said estate against the United States: Provided, That the said sum be paid to the legal representative of the said John M. Robinson.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to hear the report read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. PIKE February 6, 1884:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Frances A. Robinson, administratrix of John M. Robinson, late of Independence, State of Missouri, deceased, together with Senate bill No. 372, having had the same under consideration, ask to submit the following report:

The petitioner avers in her petition that she is the widow and administratrix of John M. Robinson, deceased; that, for some time previous to the war of the rebellion, and at the commencement thereof, said John M. Robinson resided in the city of Independence, in the State of Missouri; that he was the owner of a foundery situated in that city; that such foundery was at the beginning of the late war completely furnished with all the machinery, fixtures, and appurtenances necessary for its operation, and was operated by said Robinson until he was compelled to close it or cast cannon-shot for the rebels; that he refused to submit to this latter alternative, and being loyal to the Government of the United States, he closed his foundery, and became a soldier in the Fifth Regiment of Missouri State Militia, commanded by Col. William R. Pennick, which regiment was mustered into the service of the United States; that while he was serving as a soldier in this regiment said Col. William R. Pennick took possession of his said foundery, and used it as a cavalry-yard for the horses of his regiment, and used the tools and iron for shoeing the said horses; that all the machinery, fixtures, patterns, &c., in said foundery were removed or destroyed by the soldiers under command of said officer, and were wholly lost to their owner; that he, John M. Robinson, used every possible effort to prevent this destruction of his property, but without avail; and that the property thus destroyed or carried away was worth from $17,000 to $20,000.

These are substantially the statements contained in the petition. Numerous affidavits are on file. It appears from them that the said John M. Robinson was the owner of a foundery located in Independence, in the State of Missouri; that he was operating the same at the commencement of the war; that he and his widow, the petitioner and his administratrix, were loyal to the Government of the United States; that he refused when requested to aid the rebellion, became a soldier, enlisted in the Fifth Regiment of the Missouri State Militia, commanded by Col. William R. Pennick; that the said Colonel Pennick, as commander of said regiment, and serving under the United States Government, late in the fall of 1862, or the first of the winter of 1862-'63, took possession of said foundery, and used it as a cavalry-yard for the horses of his regiment from that time until 1863; that the blacksmith tools found therein and some wrought-iron, belonging to the said Robinson, were used for shoeing the horses of said command; and that a lot of seasoned lumber in said foundery, the property of the said Robinson, was also used by the said regiment in making bunks for the soldiers and in repairing wagons for the command.

It appears from several affidavits in the case that there were in the building at the time it was seized by Colonel Pennick the following items of personal property, with the following estimates of value of each article:

|---|---|
| 1 engine and boiler | $2,500 |
| 1 large iron lathe | 1,200 |
| 1 medium iron lathe | 920 |
| 2 small iron lathes, $500 and $350 | 850 |
| 1 iron planer | 700 |
| 1 screw-cutter | 150 |
| 1 power-drill | 175 |
| 1 full set machinist's tools | 350 |
| 1 full set foundery patterns | 4,250 |
| 1 lot foundery flasks | 950 |
| 3 new engines | 3,050 |
| 5 tons wrought iron, new | 500 |
| 1 lot machinery belts | 350 |
| Machinery for wood shop | 750 |
| Lot of unfinished work | 650 |
| Lot of seasoned lumber | 450 |
| 3 full sets smith's tools | 425 |
| Making a total of | 18,220 |

Of the articles enumerated in the above list, alleged to have been used or destroyed by Colonel Pennick's military command, there are but a few which could have been legitimately and properly used for the benefit of the soldiers or to supply the necessary wants of the regiment. The five tons of wrought-iron were used in shoeing the horses of the command. The item "sets of smith's tools" were used for the same purpose. The lot of seasoned lumber was used for making bunks for the soldiers and in repairing the wagons of the regiment. The other articles mentioned in the above bill were not in any sense necessary to nor could they have been used by the regiment, and if destroyed by the troops, the destruction must have been wanton; and it is well settled by numerous precedents that the Government is not liable to pay for property wantonly destroyed.

Except as to the wrought-iron, the proof is indefinite and unsatisfactory. The testimony is silent as to the quantity, kind, or quality of the "lot of seasoned lumber."

The committee recommend the allowance of the following sums:

|---|---|
| For 5 tons of wrought iron | $500 00 |
| For lot seasoned lumber | 200 00 |
| For 3 sets smith's tools | 300 00 |
| Making | 1,000 00 |

By the law of the United States, and the construction put upon it by the court, the committee understand that they can not allow anything for the rent of real estate in the absence of a contract therefor; there was no contract in this case. (Act of July 4, 1864, 13 Stats. at Large, 581; Filor vs. United States, 9 Wallace, 45.)

The committee recommend that the bill be amended so as to provide for the payment of $1,000 in full satisfaction of all claims, and when so amended that it pass.

No evidence has been furnished the committee that the claimant is administratrix, and the payment of the claim be made to the legal representatives of the said John M. Robinson, as provided by amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to amend the name wherever it appears by striking out "in" in "Robinson" and inserting "e," making it "Robeson" instead of "Robinson."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection that amendment will be made wherever the name appears.

Mr. COCKRELL. Both in the title and in the body of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PIKE, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of the legal representative of Francis A. Robeson."

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

The bill (S. 791) to amend an act entitled "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," approved May 6, 1882, was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. WILSON. That bill is too important, in my judgment, to be considered under this rule and with five minutes' debate. I therefore object to its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Being objected to, the bill goes over.

JOHN HATFIELD.

The bill (S. 295) for the relief of Alfred G. Hatfield, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to Alfred G. Hatfield, the legal representative of John Hatfield, deceased, late veterinary surgeon of the Thirteenth Pennsylvania Cavalry, $675, in full for services, as veterinary surgeon for that regiment for nine months, at $75 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FRANCIS GUILBEAU.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 520) for the relief of Francis Guilbeau.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first amendment reported by the Committee on Claims will be stated.

Mr. CULLOM. I think we ought to have the report read.

Mr. MAXEY. Let us get through with the amendments first.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the report had better be read before the amendments are acted upon.

Mr. MAXEY. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the report of the committee.

The CHIEF CLERK read the following report, submitted by Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, February 6, 1884:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 520) for the relief of Francis Guilbeau, report thereon as follows:

This claim is for the rent of certain buildings in San Antonio and Galveston, Tex., in the years 1865 and 1866, amounting to $3,701.67.

The loyalty of the claimant is proven conclusively.

The occupation of the buildings by officers of the United States Government for legitimate and necessary Army purposes is clearly proven, and contracts were entered into by which the claimant was to receive a reasonable rental.

The demand for rent for the buildings in San Antonio was declared reasonable by a board of survey, consisting of officers of the Army. The claim was presented to the proper officers of the Treasury, but was rejected on the ground that the location of the buildings was in a State lately in rebellion, and they were prohibited by law from paying it. It was also presented to the Southern Claims Commission, and was rejected for want of jurisdiction.

It appears from the certificate of Capt. Henry S. Clubb, assistant quartermaster and district quartermaster, that the United States Government rented a ten-room building in San Antonio of Mr. Guilbeau, on the 24th day of August, 1865, and returned possession of it to him on the 10th of December, 1865. It also appears that a board of survey, convened June 6, 1866, recommended that a rent be paid for the use of the same by the United States Government.

It appears from the proceedings of a board of survey, composed of Army officers, convened on the 28th of August, 1866, that a rent of $400 per month was not "too much" for the use of the storehouse then rented by Guilbeau to the Government.

An affidavit of A. Fretelliere shows that he, as agent of Guilbeau, agreed with Capt. Henry S. Clubb, assistant quartermaster, that he (Fretelliere) was to receive $400 per month, or $4,000 per annum, for the rent of the above-mentioned store building.

A letter from General S. K. Mizner shows that a dwelling-house of Guilbeau was occupied for military purposes by officers of the United States Army on the 12th of October, 1865, "with a perfect understanding that a proper rent should be paid" by the United States Government.

A certificate from General S. P. Heintzelman shows that the dwelling of Guilbeau was used as headquarters by General Shaw, and afterward by himself in like manner, and that Guilbeau was to receive $150 per month rent for the same; and that the building was thus occupied from the 9th day of May, 1866, to the 31st day of August of the same year.

An affidavit of A. Fretelliere, agent of Guilbeau, shows that the dwelling was occupied on the 12th day of October, 1865, and from that time until the 1st day of September, 1866; that $100 per month was the rent agreed upon from October 12, 1865, to January 1, 1866, and from that day he was to receive $150 per month.

An affidavit of James P. Nash, agent for Guilbeau, shows that the building known as Guilbeau's building, situated on lot No. 10, block No. 680, in Galveston, was occupied for Army purposes by Captain Atwood, assistant quartermaster, on the 19th day of June, 1865, and continued to be occupied until the 28th day of August, 1865, and it was agreed that he was to be paid punctually by the Government. He states further that he never received any rent from the Government for the use of the building, and that the rent charged the Government was but little more than half the sum he received for it immediately after the vacation of the same by the Government.

The affidavits of Messrs. William M. Varmell and James A. McKee show that Guilbeau was loyal to the United States Government during the war, and that he was compelled to leave his home in San Antonio because of his loyalty.

Your committee are of opinion that $2,600 would be a fair compensation to make to claimant.

Claimant died since the former reports were made on the claim, and we recommend that the bill be amended so as to make the amount payable to the legal representatives of Francis Guilbeau, deceased, and when so amended that the bill do pass.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, in line 5, after the words "paid to," to insert "the legal representatives of;" in line 6, after the word "Gilbeau," to insert "deceased," and to strike out the words "upon his lodging with the proper officer of the Quartermaster's Department his receipt;" in line 7, after the words "in full of," to strike out "his;" and in line 8, after the word "houses," to insert "belonging to the said Gilbeau;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $2,600 is appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be paid to the legal representatives of Francis Gilbeau, deceased, in full of claims against the United States for the rent of houses belonging to said Gilbeau, and all damages to the same, in Galveston and San Antonio, Tex., during the years 1865 and 1866.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. MAXEY. There is a clerical error in the spelling of the name "Gilbeau." It should be "Guilbeau." I ask that the letter "u" be put in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the bill will be so amended wherever the name occurs.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MAXEY, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Francis Guilbeau."

WAR TAX OF 1861.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being the educational bill.

Mr. PLUMB. I desire unanimous consent to offer a resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. BLAIR. What is the resolution?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the resolution, if the Senator from New Hampshire will permit.

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly; for information.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to advise the Senate what amount of the war tax of 1861 is due and unpaid, from what States or from the citizens of what States due, whether any portion of said tax, and, if so, what portion, has been paid by withholding money due to any State or States from the General Government, and whether the rule adopted in withholding such money has been applied alike to all the States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider at this time the resolution just read. Is there objection?

Mr. BLAIR. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is objection, and the resolution goes over.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. PLUMB to recommit the bill to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. HAMPTON, Mr. President, it has been a source of peculiar gratification to me and doubtless to our constituents that my colleague [Mr. BUTLER] and myself have with singular uniformity acted in perfect accord on all the grave questions which have come before this body. It is therefore with sincere regret that I find myself in opposition to him on a measure which I regard as of vital consequence to the best interests of our common State. In all that he has said of the pluck, the energy, the manhood of that State, of her wonderful recuperative powers, of her earnest efforts in the cause of education, and of the extraordinary results she has achieved under the most disheartening conditions, I agree most fully. He could use no expressions in reference to our State too laudatory to find a responsive echo in my heart, for that, like his, clings to the land of our nativity with a loyalty and a devotion that have not known and never can know change. I know as well as any one what my State has accomplished under the most adverse circumstances, and no one can feel a higher pride than myself in the heroic courage, the sublime fortitude, the silent patience, and the unshaken faith she has manifested under trials such as few States have been subjected to. I know, too, the great recuperative energies of my fellow-citizens, and I look back with unalloyed pride to that time when they rallied to the call of their prostrate State, and, rescuing her from the ruthless hands that were throttling her to death, placed her once again where she of right belongs, amid the great sisterhood of free and sovereign States. Knowing all this, I sympathize fully with the ringing words of my colleague as he recited the marvelous story of her redemption, of her great resources, of her wonderful development, of the bright future in store for her, and of her praiseworthy efforts in the cause of public education. Strongly as he dwelt on this latter theme, he omitted some points of great consequence, and I wish to supplement his argument by calling the attention of the Senate to them.

When the government of the State passed in 1877 into Democratic hands there was found to be a debt, known as the school indebtedness, of about $400,000. This was a heavy burden upon the State, but under the wise administration of the superintendent of public education, the present distinguished chief magistrate of the State, the debt was liquidated, though in paying it this large amount has been diverted from its legitimate purpose—that of promoting public education. The assessed value of property in South Carolina is about one hundred and thirty-eight millions at the present time. Prior to the war it was four hundred and ninety millions. The taxation on this latter valuation was about $400,000. The gross amount of the taxes levied in the State from 1851 to 1855 inclusive was $2,057,101. This levy was upon a basis of four hundred and ninety millions of property. In 1870 there was levied the enormous sum of $2,265,047, or $107,945 more than the aggregate taxation of the five years mentioned on double the amount of property assessed during that period. In 1872, if my memory serves me right, the tax assessed upon the people for State purposes exceeded $4,000,000. It is scarcely necessary for me to say that this taxation occurred during the carpet-bag régime in the State, when fraud, corruption, vice, and crime ran riot in the State, and these figures I have cited explain how South Carolina was brought to the verge of bankruptcy before the State was rescued from the robber-band that had for so long a time despoiled her.

When the government changed hands in 1876 the finances and the credit and the resources of the State were in a lamentable condition, but, poor as were our people, they voted then for an amendment of the constitution levying a tax of 2 mills on the dollar for educational purposes, and this amendment was ratified in January, 1877. The poll-tax, which should amount, with our present population of a million, to nearly $200,000, is also set apart strictly for the same object. To these two sources of revenue for public schools must be added that of local taxation.

I have shown how desperate was the condition of the State in 1877, and I wish now to show how earnest have been her efforts for the promotion of education. The whole of the State tax is about $630,000, while the county taxes amount to about $800,000, in all not quite a million and a half. The taxes in aid of the public schools amount to rather more than $500,000, so that the school-tax amounts to more than one-third of all the taxes collected in the State.

Now it seems to me that my State has not been remiss in making provision for public education when she appropriates half a million of dollars for this purpose on property assessed at one hundred and thirty-eight millions. Let me call the attention of the Senate to another significant and striking fact. The expense of the State government, including interest on the public debt, is about $240,000; the expense of keeping up the public schools and charitable institutions amounts to nearly $600,000. In other words, our State appropriates largely more than twice as much for these purposes as she does for the whole expenses of her State government. These public schools, maintained at so heavy a cost, are open to all, and no distinction is made on account of race or color. May we not ask, then, if any State can show a better record on this question than South Carolina has made for herself under difficulties which might well have appalled the most sanguine and courageous heart?

The figures I have given prove what the State has done in the cause of education, and I desire to cite now an example of magnificent municipal aid in the same direction. The city of Charleston has a population of about 50,000; 23,000 white and 27,000 black. She appropriated $72,000 in addition to the funds raised by the State tax, and of this sum the blacks pay 3 per cent., though their children attend the schools in numbers equal to those of the whites. This city, devastated by fire and by the sword, robbed by unscrupulous plunderers in the recent past, pays for public education on a ratio one-third more than does the prosperous and classic city of Boston for its whole system of education, and it does this while pressed down by a debt of $5,000,000.

These facts are in the line of the able argument made by my colleague to prove that in the great race of educational progress our State has not been a laggard, and I cite them with just and honest pride. But these facts, so ably and eloquently presented by my colleague, have brought me to a conclusion directly opposite to that taken by himself. I doubt not that there are 250,000 children between the ages of 10 and 16 in our State requiring education, and this can not be given to them properly at a less cost annually than $5 per capita. This would involve an outlay of $1,250,000, and how is it possible for our State to raise this sum in her present exhausted condition? If the whites were to apply the 95 per cent. of the taxes paid by them to the education of their own race they might soon reduce the ratio of illiteracy, but the whole fund collected is applied to public education without discrimination as to race or color, and I would not have it otherwise. But surely in the face of these facts we are authorized to ask aid of the General Government in behalf of these people who were made citizens and adopted as wards by it.

Important as I deem this aid to be for the preservation of good government in the whole country I would not advocate this or any kindred measure that violated in my opinion the Constitution of the United States. Like my colleague, I have been trained in that school which teaches a strict construction of that instrument, and I have not yet learned to "camp outside of the Constitution" to subserve party ends or for the sake of expediency. I can not see that the bill under consideration is at all more open to objections on constitutional grounds than was the one introduced at a previous session by my distinguished friend and colleague, and a constitutional lawyer so able as himself, so jealous of any infractions of our great charter of liberty, would surely not present to this august body a measure violative of the provisions of the Constitution. I felt myself on safe ground, therefore, in following his lead when he, impelled by the pressing need of educating our people, invoked the aid of the General Government for this purpose. I occupy the same ground now, for the most careful and anxious reflection has brought me to the conclusion that the greatest danger threatening the permanency of our institutions comes from the frightful prevalence of illiteracy in our midst. The hands of those to whom the blessings of education have unfortunately been denied are potent for evil, and in my opinion no government has discharged its highest duty to its citizens that does not open the fountains of knowledge freely to all. There is more truth than poetry in the oft-quoted lines which declare that—

'Tis education forms the common mind;
Just as the twig is bent the tree's inclined.

And if we desire to form the minds of that generation which is so soon to take our places and to direct the destiny of this grand Republic, we must see to it that they are fitted to assume the high duties and the grave responsibilities that will fall upon them. We must legislate for our children if we do not wish to prove recreant to the noble trust committed to our keeping.

Actuated by these motives, I feel bound, as a citizen, as a Senator, as a patriot, to support the bill under consideration. It does not meet my approval in every detail, but I appreciate the difficulties that the committee who presented it had to meet, and I regard it as a step in the right direction. I shall not attempt to discuss its merits, for these have already been urged by abler tongues than my own, and they speak for themselves; but I wish to touch very briefly one or two points which have been brought out in this debate. Several Senators have twitted us of the South with not having put our own shoulders to the wheel while we call on the Federal Government for help, and others have expressed the fear that our State authorities would not apply the funds appropriated honestly. In refutation of the first charge I have given the figures to prove that it is unfounded so far as my own State is concerned, and I am sure that it is equally unfounded in reference to the whole South. The other and graver charge is too unworthy to be noticed, and I shall simply quote some testimony upon both of these points which should have weight before this body. Hon. J. H. Smart, superintendent of public instruction in Indiana, used the following language in an address delivered some time ago:

Now, I want to express the opinion that the Southern people are willing to do all they can to cure this great evil and remove this great wrong, and, so far as I have observed, the work that has been done, under existing circumstances, has been a marvelous work. The Southern people have made a heroic effort, certainly in three or four States that I have visited, to do the best that could be done for these colored people. I want to say that throughout the length and breadth of the Southern States, without one exception, the colored people are given the same advantages that the white people are given. No distinction whatever is made; and, so far as I was able to find out, there is an almost unanimous, certainly an overwhelming, sentiment in favor of educating the colored children equally with the white children. And I believe from what I saw that we are able to trust the existing State organizations represented by these gentlemen; we are able to trust them with whatever means we can appropriate, and I speak after some investigation and after deliberation.

Let me quote a few words from Rev. Dr. Mayo in reference to the same subject, than whom there is no higher authority on this continent. Said he:

Another matter has forced itself very constantly on my attention, which has been alluded to before, which is this: I am pretty well acquainted with the condition of education in our country and in other countries, and I have no hesitation in announcing to you, gentlemen, my conviction that never within ten years in the history of the world has an effort so great, so persistent, and so absolutely heroic been made by any people for the education of the children as by the leading class of the people in our Southern States.

Practically, within ten years every one of these Southern States has put on its statute book a system of public schools; practically, within this time every district of country in the South has received something that can be called a school. This school public, as we may call it, consisting of State officials, of school officers, of superior teachers, of thoughtful people all over the South, is to my mind the most forcible, the most persistent, the most devoted school public now in any part of the world. There is no body of superior teachers doing so much work for so little pay and under such great disadvantages as in the South to-day. There is no minority of people working so hard to overcome this terrible calamity of illiteracy anywhere in the world to-day as in the South. I give this as the deliberate result of two years of observation in twelve States.

* * * * * * *

We may say ideally and abstractly that the Southern people can give more than they do for education; but practically, looking at them as we look at every people in the world, I believe that the limit is reached.

Again he says:

One thing more, gentlemen. I am acquainted with the State superintendent of instruction, I believe, in every Southern State. I am acquainted with the State school board, I think, of every Southern State but two or three. I have studied with great care in the records of all those offices their methods of distribution of money. I believe there is no set of men in this country who are handling a moderate amount of money with greater economy, with greater fidelity than these gentlemen. It seems to me it would be a great mistake in distributing such funds as you give to put into each of these States a dual administration. If that should be done, I believe that at once $100,000 or $200,000 of money would be thrown away, virtually, for supervision. I believe if there is any set of men in his country that can be trusted to administer a fund of $10,000,000 or $15,000,000 in thirteen or fourteen States with fidelity it is the school authorities of those States, and therefore it seems to me that this money should go directly to the children through the accustomed channels, of course being guarded by all proper safeguards in the central power.

Mr. FRYE. Is that Dr. Mayo?

Mr. HAMPTON. It is Dr. Mayo.

Mr. BLAIR. The testimony is all that way from those who are acquainted with the situation.

Mr. HAMPTON. This is the evidence borne by able, devoted, impartial witnesses, who testify to the noble work already done by the South, and whose knowledge of our people, gained by close contact, impels them to express the utmost confidence not only in our sincerity but in our integrity. With such testimony in our favor, coming from such sources, we need repel no charges made here reflecting on the character of our people.

One word more, Mr. President, and I shall close. The Senator from Oregon in his remarks used this expression:

I merely state what I understand to be the fact, that the colored man in some portions of the South is practically denied the rights already conferred upon him by law.

I shall not be drawn into any controversy upon this vexed and irritating subject, and my only purpose in quoting his words is to call the attention of the Senate to the laws in South Carolina in reference to the civil rights of the colored people. These laws, it must be borne in mind, have been kept on the statute-books by a Legislature overwhelmingly Democratic, and I doubt if any State has more stringent provisions for the protection of its citizens.

In the General Statutes of South Carolina, at page 167, section 514, these words occur:

The several solicitors of this State are hereby specially charged with the prompt and rigorous prosecution of offenses against the civil rights of citizens; and every solicitor who shall fail in this respect in the performance of his duty shall be deemed to have committed a misfeasance in office, and, on conviction, shall forfeit his office, and be incapable of holding office for five years, and shall also pay a fine of $500; and in every case in which any solicitor shall fail in his duty the attorney-general shall make the most effective prosecution possible against him on behalf of the State; and neither any solicitor nor the attorney-general shall settle or enter a nol. pros. in any such case except by the consent of the court.

The law to which that section refers is found on page 730, chapter 109, headed "Offenses against civil rights," and is as follows:

SEC. 2601. It shall not be lawful for any common carriers, or any party or parties engaged in any business, calling, or pursuit, for the carrying on of which a license or charter is required by any law, municipal, State, or Federal, or by any public rule or regulations, whether such party or parties have obtained such license or charter, or failed or neglected to obtain the same, or for any party or parties keeping an inn, restaurant, or other place of accommodation or refreshment, whether a license or charter is required for the keeping of the same or otherwise, to discriminate between persons on account of race, color, or previous condition, who shall make lawful application for the benefit of such business, calling, or pursuit.

SEC. 2602. Any party so discriminating shall be considered as having violated this chapter, and, upon conviction, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $200, or imprisonment for not more than six months.

SEC. 2603. Every case arising under section 2601, and not provided for specifically in some succeeding section, shall be prosecuted and decided in accordance with the general provisions of this chapter.

SEC. 2604. Whoever, being a common carrier under any public license, charter, rule, or regulation, shall, by himself or another, willfully assign any special quarters or accommodations whatever to any passenger or person whom such common carrier may have undertaken to carry or who shall under any pretense deny or refuse to any person lawfully applying for the same accommodation equal in every respect to that furnished by him to any other person for like compensation or reward in a like case, having no regard to the person per se who may be applicants therefor, shall, on conviction, be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 or by imprisonment for not more than six months.

SEC. 2605. Whoever conducting or managing any theater or other place of amusement or recreation, by whatever name the same may be recognized, or however called or known, if such theater or place be licensed or chartered, or be under any public rule or regulation whatever, shall willfully make any discrimination against any person lawfully applying for accommodation in, or admission to, any such theater or place, on account of the race, color, or previous condition of the applicant, or shall refuse or deny to any person lawfully applying therefor accommodation equal in every respect to that furnished at such place for a like reward to any other person, on account of race, color, or previous condition of the applicant therefor, shall, on conviction, be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000, or imprisonment for not more than six months.

SEC. 2606. Whoever, not being the principal offender under sections 2603 and 2604 of this chapter, shall aid or abet in or about the commission of any of the offenses therein mentioned, shall, on conviction, be punished at the discretion of the court.

SEC. 2607. Every commander, conductor, manager, or other person superintending or having charge of any vessel or vehicle, or any theater or other place mentioned in this chapter, and, as such, having authority and power to order and manage affairs in or about the same, who shall suffer or permit to occur any violation of this chapter which such commander, conductor or manager, or person so superintending and having such charge as aforesaid can possibly prevent shall be considered an aider and abettor in the commission of any such offense, and, on conviction, shall be subject to the penalties provided in section 2605 of this chapter.

SEC. 2608. Every corporation or party whatever, holding any charter or license under the authority of this State, who shall violate any of the provisions of this chapter, shall thereupon be deemed and held to have committed an abuse of the franchises conferred by or under every such charter or license, and, on conviction, shall forfeit every such charter or license; and any party or parties who, having so forfeited any such charter or license as aforesaid, shall, nevertheless, presume to use or operate under or by virtue of the same, as well as every person who shall be found aiding any such party or parties thereabout, shall, on conviction, be punished by a fine of not more than $500, or imprisonment for not more than six months.

SEC. 2609. In every trial for violating any provisions of this chapter, when it shall be charged that any person has been refused or denied admission to, or due accommodation in, any of the places in this chapter mentioned, on account of the race, color, or previous condition of the applicant, and such applicant is a colored or black person, the burden shall be on the defendant party or parties so having refused or denied such admission or accommodation to show that the same was not done in violation of this chapter.

I place this act on record in order to show that in my State the rights conferred by law on the colored man are not denied to him. I regret, sir, that I have had neither time nor data to enable me to present my views to the Senate in a connected and condensed manner. Nor should I have trespassed upon its patience but for my desire to place upon record my hearty support of the measure under consideration.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, my disposition was to take no part in the debate upon the bill before the Senate, but the discussion of it has become so general, and being a member of the committee that reported it, I feel that I ought to say something in support of its passage. I do not believe that any measure approaching this in importance has been before the Senate or is likely to be before the Senate this session, with as much popular approval of its passage. My service on the Committee on Education and Labor for five months during the last summer and fall enabled me to learn something of the public necessity for the aid proposed by the bill and the public demand for such an appropriation. Every witness examined by the committee upon the condition and needs of the public schools in the Southern States urged Federal aid to these States to enable them to extend the benefits of a common-school education to their illiterate children.

The Southern States, as has been shown and often repeated in this debate, have gone to the extent of their ability in providing for the support of public schools. Every State has a well-organized and efficient system, under the management of able and highly qualified superintendents; but it is an undeniable fact that the average time the schools are open will not exceed seventy-five days in the year, and the consequence is that the little learned in the short time the children are in school is mostly forgotten while the schools are closed, and thereby the benefits of the system are lost to the children, and the whole trouble is chargeable to the want of money. But some Senators representing Southern States which would get a large share of the appropriation say their people can get along without this aid, and that while their burdens are great, the evils of illiteracy appalling, yet it is wiser and better in the long run that the people be left alone to carry their own burdens, and that the virtues to be cultivated and developed by self-reliance and self-support and long-suffering and patience in their trials are priceless to them and their children, while the distribution of about twelve millions the first year and an average of over seven and a half millions for ten years will be dangerous in its effects upon these high virtues of self-reliance and self-support in making them indolent and indifferent in the important work of improving and making their public schools, supported alone by themselves, a great public success and benefit.

The people of the South have listened a long time to such teachings and heeded the cry that it was wrong and dangerous for them to accept Federal aid from a common Treasury to which they have contributed more than their just and equal share, and that self-support and self-reliance were invaluable habits that would develop great qualities in the long run. They are waking up and realizing the fact that they have had the long run, but the habits of self-support and self-reliance are not bettering their condition. They see their associates in a common Government accepting and appropriating all the aid they can get from constitutional and unconstitutional legislation and exacting tribute by law from every other industry except their own, and while they laugh at the self-denial of the people of the South they are growing richer and more powerful.

The Southern States do not ask this appropriation as a bounty. They have contributed more than their share of the revenue out of which this money is appropriated. The use to which the money is to be applied will inure largely to the common national benefit in eradicating an alarming public evil. It can not be denied that the dangerous effects of illiteracy are far reaching We all know that the difficulties in the way of home rule by local governments in the South and the disturbance of the friendly and harmonious and confiding relations of our people, so indispensable in our experiment of self-government and so necessary in securing the benefits and blessings of our union of States, is chargeable more largely to the existence of negro illiteracy in our citizenship and suffrage than to any other and all other causes combined. Why are we unable to unite in a common effort—call it experiment if you please—of lending a helping hand to the States engaged in the struggle with this public calamity?

Some Senators representing Southern States, for whose judgment and convictions I have the greatest respect, are unable to support the bill on constitutional grounds. This objection of course is conclusive. But I am surprised at their opposition on grounds of expediency. They question the policy of affording this aid because it will beget a disposition to look alone to the Federal Treasury for the means of keeping up their common schools, when the bill itself provides that each State shall raise by its own taxation or otherwise an amount equal to one-third for five years, and thereafter shall raise each year an amount equal to what they receive of this appropriation. And let me remind my brother Senators of the South that while they justly condemn the offensive distrust of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] of the capacity and willingness of the Southern States to make a fair and equal distribution of this money to carry out the objects of the appropriation, these Southern Senators themselves have expressed their distrust of the ability of the people of the Southern States to withstand the temptations and dangers of accepting this money from the Federal Treasury. They express the fear that this Federal money will be a dangerous temptation, likely to destroy the self-reliance of the people and make them so indifferent and careless of their duties to contribute out of their own means to the support of their common schools that before long the whole business of educating the children will have to be given up to the Federal Government.

Mr. President, I have no such fears of the effects of the aid afforded by this bill. This is a Government of the people, by the people, and for the people. Our great experiment of self-government by the people is an established success. The people are abundantly able to take care of their own rights and liberties. The band of usurpation may show itself in the measures and policies of political parties, but whenever it is seen by the people it will be paralyzed by the first blow at the ballot-box.

I have no idea that the people of a single State in our Union would seriously consider the proposition of surrendering to the Federal Government their exclusive jurisdiction and control of the education of their own people. The bill before the Senate expressly excludes any possibility of such construction, by declaring that the bill does nothing more than furnish aid to the States in exercising their exclusive jurisdiction over their common schools. There is no pretense of claim of power in the Federal Government of any jurisdiction in the establishment and control of public schools in the States. There is not a single provision in the bill before the Senate requiring reports from State officials of the use that has been made of the appropriation that is not contained in the Morrill bill that passed the Senate in the Forty-sixth Congress by a vote of 41 to 6. It must be admitted that the Federal revenue derived from taxation is as much the property of the United States as the public lands, and that when the public lands are donated or the public revenue appropriated it is the right and the duty of Congress as the trustee and custodian of the public lands and the public revenue to require of the States a report to Congress, so that the people of the United States may be informed that their money has been honestly applied to the objects of the appropriation.

No, Mr. President; there is no usurpation in this bill. There is no danger in it as a precedent. If any justification could ever be claimed by any adventurer in the work of usurpation of Federal jurisdiction and control of common schools in the States it is mostly to be found in the failure of the bill before the Senate. Defeat this bill and leave the Southern States to grapple with the evils of negro illiteracy in their citizenship and suffrage and carry their other burdens, and there may be so much delay and complaint as to attract public attention to the demand for relief of this class of illiterates. The offer made in this bill is to give temporary aid without attempting interference with the exclusive jurisdiction of the States. There is a wide difference between aid and jurisdiction. If the aid is rejected in doing the work of the States jurisdiction may be demanded on the ground of national necessity to eradicate a national evil and discharge a national obligation.

A few words on the constitutional power of Congress to make this appropriation. The exercise of the war power produced results and conditions that invoked the power of amending the Constitution. As conditions of reconstruction and the restoration of the Union of the States these results and conditions were incorporated in the Constitution. As an inseparable and necessary result of these organic changes the evils and dangers of negro illiteracy were incorporated in the citizenship of the States and of the United States and in the voting population of the States. To tell me that the United States can impose these evils and dangers upon the States by the exercise of undoubted powers, and that there is no authority to aid the States in relieving themselves and the Union of the standing menace to both of negro illiteracy, is to go a little deeper into strict construction than I am willing to follow.

What effect education of the negro will have upon his qualifications for the duties and responsibilities of citizenship and suffrage is a question time alone can solve. I have my speculations, which it would be profitless to discuss. I know that there is an overwhelming public demand that the negro shall have and enjoy the opportunities and advantages of a common-school education. As a Senator representing Alabama and the other United States, I feel constrained to give the bill before the Senate my hearty support.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, so far as this debate has proceeded it has been based on the statistics presented by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR], who has exhibited very commendable zeal and industry in advocating this bill. When the Morrill bill was before the Senate, to which the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] has just alluded, the Senator from New Hampshire made an exhibit of illiteracy in the respective cities of the Union, and that exhibit was perfectly appalling to me, as I suppose it was to other gentlemen whose attention was called to it at that time or subsequently. I have had occasion lately to review that statement, and also to examine a review and analysis of the grounds on which it was based by the superintendent of education for the State of New Jersey. My surprise could not possibly be exceeded by any statement when I saw in the speech of the Senator from New Hampshire, in regard to the statistics of Saint Louis:

> Saint Louis has a school population of 106,000; 55,000 are enrolled; 36,000 is the average attendance; 50,000 are growing up in the savage state, aggravated by those capacities for proficiency in evil which come from the contact with civilized depravity.

If there are 50,000 children in a state of utter barbarism, aggravated by contact with civilized depravity, in the principal city of Missouri, in the interest of human life and human progress I want to know it. If that be the case, there ought to be safeguards and sign-boards put up warning the innocent stranger from venturing within the walls of that most abandoned of American cities, that great modern Gomorrah. If there could be any amelioration of the horrible picture it might perhaps be found in the frightful position of the city of Chicago, and I call the attention of the recent governor and the present Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] to the fact that the principal city in Illinois is represented to be even worse than that, to be actually worse than the ancient cities where corruption reigned supreme; and therefore a statement which I have recently seen of one of the commissioners of the District of Columbia must be eminently true, that he moved away from that city to the city of Washington because he could not venture into a depot in Chicago after 9 o'clock at night without a pistol in his pocket. I do not say this is true, but if the statistics of the Senator from New Hampshire are correct, then I am prepared to believe anything of that kind:

> Chicago enrolls less than half—43 per cent.—of her children in the public schools; less than one-third are habitually in school; 77,473, or 57 per cent., never attend at all. Very few of these receive instruction in private schools.

But when we come to Cincinnati, then, sir, the darkness, the appalling darkness that overwhelm Chicago and Saint Louis becomes even as light as the noonday sun. I call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to the fact that he represents a city in which human life and human property, according to these statistics, are not worth even the taxation that is paid on the property or worth the paper on which the laws are written or printed that purport to give protection to personal security and life:

> The average attendance in Cincinnati is 27,000, less than one-third of the whole number, while 51,000 are not enrolled at all. It does not relieve this dark picture to say that these must be in private schools, for out of the school population of the entire State, numbering 1,043,320, only 28,650 are in private schools. Of these, probably not more than 10,000 can be found in Cincinnati. There are more than 40,000 children, then, in that great city to-day who are growing up in ignorance as dense as that of the jungles of Africa, while they are subjected to the influence of the sharpened culture of civilized vice. Yet Cincinnati is one of the best of our great cities and Ohio is a model State.

Mr. President, this condition of affairs is appalling if it exists. As the superintendent of education of the State of New Jersey says, it demonstrates the appalling fact that with our enormous expenditure and with all the agencies we have for the education of children in these United States this state of things exists in thirty-four of the principal cities of the United States.

Sir, in the State of Missouri if there is one thing of which we are proud, and justly proud, it is our common-school system, and I undertake to say to-day that not in the city of Boston, the boasted city of literary culture and advanced civilization, is there a common-school system superior—I was about to say equal to that in the city of Saint Louis, at this very hour. Hundreds of citizens come there from other portions of the Union in order to enjoy the advantages of that splendid system of common-school education; and from the very basis of education, from learning the letters up to the classics and German and French and painting and all the accomplishments of education, the high schools in Saint Louis are equal to such schools in any portion of the whole United States. And yet, with these magnificent advantages, according to the Senator from New Hampshire there are 50,000 howling dervishes, worse than the Cheyennes and Arapahoes with their scalping-knives and tomahawks, loose in Saint Louis.

Now let us see the basis of these statistics. I trust to the State superintendent of New Jersey for an analysis of these figures. This gentleman, after alluding to the statistics for the State of New Jersey presented by the Senator from New Hampshire, which show that there are 90,074 children not attending school in the State of New Jersey, makes the following criticism, which I shall detain the Senate by reading in a spirit of the utmost kindness, because these facts ought to be known to the country. If the statistics are true they are reliable, and if not we certainly ought to know it, because great injustice has been done.

> Let us examine how these figures, showing such a lamentable state of illiteracy, are secured by these gentlemen. The process is exceeding simple. They, in every case, deduct the school enrollment from the school census, and the difference is taken by them as expressing the number of children who are growing up without a knowledge of reading and writing. The 7,500,000 children in the United States of school age who are growing up, as Mr. Cook asserts, in absolute ignorance of the English alphabet, is the difference, as will be observed, between 10,500,000, the aggregate enrollment of school children in the United States, and the 18,000,000, the aggregate school census. In ascertaining the number of growing illiterates in the cities, Senator BLAIR, in each case, subtracts the number of children enrolled in the public schools from the school census. As, for instance, in the case of Chicago, the census is 137,035, and the number enrolled in the public schools is 59,562; subtracting the latter from the former, we have 77,473 children between the ages of 6 and 21 whose names were not upon the school enrollment during the year for which this report was made, and 'his is the number of children in Chicago who, according to Senator BLAIR's figures, will never know how to read or write. The absurdity of this statement must be apparent to every one without argument.
> Let us now see where New Jersey stands in this dark catalogue. Her non-enrollment list amounts to 90,074. This is the fearful number of growing illiterates that must be placed to our discredit. This number includes children, as we all know, with varying ages ranging from 5 to 18. Let us imagine that we have this vast array of heathen before us, and let us endeavor to ascertain why their names are not included in the school-enrollment list.
> From the reports made by the county and city superintendents we are able to ascertain the percentage of children of each age not attending school. And having the entire number for each age, we are able to determine about how many children there are of each age that go to make up this aggregate of 90,074 so-called illiterates in New Jersey.
> The figures approximately are as follows:
> Number 5 years of age out of school ..... 8,764

These are infants under 5—

> Mewling and puking in the nurse's arms.

They are illiterates "who will never know how to read or write!" They are shut out from this temple of education which the Senator from

New Hampshire seeks to erect in every State of the Union. Then this superintendent goes on:

|---|---|
| Number 5 years of age out of school | 8,764 |
| Number 6 years of age out of school | 568 |
| Number 7 years of age out of school | 268 |
| Number 8 years of age out of school | 268 |
| Number 9 years of age out of school | 268 |
| Number 10 years of age out of school | 536 |
| Number 11 years of age out of school | 1,569 |
| Number 12 years of age out of school | 2,975 |
| Number 13 years of age out of school | 5,641 |
| Number 14 years of age out of school | 11,132 |
| Number 15 years of age out of school | 15,423 |
| Number 16 years of age out of school | 20,109 |
| Number 17 years of age out of school | 22,553 |
| Total | 90,074 |

Now, excluding the infants—for we should not surely be cruel enough to say that because they have not learned to read and write before 5 years of age they will never learn—when we come to those who are 14, 15, 16, or 17 years old, in this age of ours and with the American people constituted as they are, with this progressive blood which leaps like torrents in the face of every one of these children, we know that they are fitted for the duties of manhood and we know that there are hundreds and thousands of boys who at 14 and 15 become self-supporting, who go into the world with an education not perfect in the classics, not full of accomplishments, but with enough learning in regard to reading and writing to enable them to take part in the battle of life. And yet according to the Senator, if I am correct and if the superintendent of New Jersey is correct, he presents in his exhibit 11,132 who are out of school at 14 years of age, 15,423 at 15 years of age, 20,109 at 16 years of age, and 22,553 at 17 years in his aggregate of the illiterates of New Jersey.

I call attention to the fact that as you increase the school age you increase the number of children who are non-attendants. The children of the poor, who are only able to attend when they can not work, up to 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, and 17, are then called to assist the family in supporting the younger children and a dependent mother or father perhaps. Is it fair, is it right to put them in this table as illiterates with those who can not read and write, who are shut out from education entirely? Is it fair to stamp illiteracy upon such a vast proportion of the citizens of the United States in the face of an exhibit like this?

Of this vast army of 90,074 poor unfortunates who Senator BLAIR, in his tender compassion, says "might as well have been born in a heathen country," 8,764 are 5 years of age. Many of them are well dressed; some, indeed, are even handsomely attired, and show evidence of coming from homes where they are surrounded not only with the comforts of life but with its luxuries. They appear bright and intelligent, and it would seem quite within the range of possibilities, during the thirteen school-going years that are still before them, for some of them at least to acquire the ability to call by name the letters of the English alphabet. We are assured, however, that such can never be the case.

Behold, therefore, the awful spectacle! Eight thousand seven hundred and sixty-four children in this State 5 years of age and out of school, who are "growing up," as Rev. Joseph Cook asserts, "without a knowledge of the English alphabet!" A great army of little boys and girls just out of babyhood, "and not one of them," says Senator BLAIR, "will ever know how to read or write!"

Let us next consider the condition of those 6 years of age. We have 568 of those that are out of school. Many of them also appear well dressed and even intelligent. In ascertaining why they are not attending school we find that many of them are being taught at home by their mothers, and are already able to read fluently in the readers of the lower grades; but their names are not in the school registers, and hence they, too, are classed with this vast army of unfortunate illiterates.

I call the attention of the Senate to this, because it comes from a man whose life is devoted to education; it comes from an expert; it comes from the superintendent of education of one of the States of this Union.

Of those 7, 8, and 9 years of age but few in this State are found out of school, only 268, or 1 per cent. of each age. Their absence may be temporary, for which various reasons may be assigned. Many of them were in school last year and will be again next year, but this year they are included in that fearful list represented by the difference between the enrolled attendance and the total census, and hence are growing up in "ignorance as dense as that in the jungles of Africa."

Of those 10 years of age we have 536; of those 11, 1,569; of those 12, 2,975. The reasons for these being out of school are various. Many of them belong to wealthy families, and are receiving a superior education under special instructors at their own homes. They too, Senator BLAIR thinks, "might as well have been born in a heathen country."

Of those 13 years of age we have 5,641; of those 14, 11,132; of those 15, 15,423. We observe how rapidly the number of those out of school is increasing, and any one having had charge of a school knows how large a proportion of our children leave at these ages. The great bulk of them have finished their educational course. They not only have learned to read and write, but have acquired a good knowledge of geography, grammar, and arithmetic, and some of them have even pursued branches still more advanced, as history and kindred studies. They belong to that large but respectable class of children who at these ages, ranging from 13 to 15, must begin to earn something for their own support. They are in our factories, our shops, and our stores and offices. They have secured their positions because of the educational training they have already received in our schools. They also, however, are classed, without question, as among those who "will never know how to read or write."

We have remaining those 16 and 17 years of age. Ninety-eight per cent. of all the children in the schools of the cities complete their school course by the time they reach the age of 16. Between 40,000 and 50,000 of this aggregate of 90,074 illiterates have reached these ages, 16 and 17. Their education closed with the grammar-school course. These are classed as young men and young women. The majority of the former are in business, while the latter are engaged in home duties. Some of the young men at this age are pursuing their studies under private tutors preparatory to entering college; and some of the young ladies 17 years of age, we venture to believe, have already changed their names and are established in homes of their own. Still we are called upon to "behold the awful record!" These, too, are "growing up in ignorance as dense as that in the jungles of Africa."

I am obliged to Mr. Apgar for this statement. I do not conceive how it is possible for the Senator from New Hampshire to arrive at the statistics which he has given here except from the basis which Mr. Apgar puts down in the pamphlet from which I have read. The Senator from New Hampshire must have taken the enrollment under the census and then the school enrollment, and subtracting one from the other he arrived at the terrible and appalling conclusion that there were all these children not enrolled upon the school books, and that the difference between that and the census enrollment consists of those who are perpetually and forever involved in a hopeless and remediless situation or condition of illiteracy and darkness.

Suppose the Senator from New Hampshire is correct; suppose it is true that there are fifty thousand howling savages to-day in the city of Saint Louis, with our educational system as good as can be invented by mortal man, I undertake to say, with the present lights before us in regard to educating children, then the conclusion is irresistible that no matter how much the National Government may give, there is a radical defect in the system of voluntary education, and money even can not remedy it. You are then compelled to come to that other proposition which involves the very existence of free government in my opinion, which is the greatest problem to be determined yet upon this continent, the right of the State to resort to compulsory education. My own mind upon that subject is thoroughly and emphatically made up. It is not necessary now to discuss it; but if the statistics of the Senator from New Hampshire are correct, then the only resort that can be had in this Government to prevent illiteracy and its effect upon the suffrage in making it vicious is to compulsory education.

One word more, for I do not propose to say anything further on this bill except to record my vote against it. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] said in his speech to the Senate day before yesterday that it was as clear as a proposition from Euclid that if you concede the power of the National Government to make a donation to the States for the purpose of removing illiteracy, the larger power embraced the smaller, and the National Government could put such conditions upon that grant as it pleased. The Senator from Ohio made a mistake that never would have been made by a lawyer who had trained himself to analysis as to a proposition of this kind. The Senator from Ohio treats this subject as if it were a matter of compact between man and man or between one corporation and another. I grant you that the larger power embraces the smaller in a personal contract between two individuals, but that rule does not hold where there is a written constitution and where the National Government is limited in its functions to the written powers that are delegated to it by the States in that Constitution. The General Government might have the power to give to the States, and yet would not have the power to impose conditions which would absolutely amount to the National Government going into the States for the purpose of choosing and marking out the educational system of the State to which it made the donation.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH], who takes a very different view of this question from myself, admits the proposition. He says there is a very great difference between jurisdiction and the mere power of donation. The Supreme Court recognized that in the greatest decision ever delivered upon this question by any tribunal upon this continent. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND], who has discussed most ably and learnedly this question in opposition to my views, said when we had the Morrill bill before us in 1879, that as all religions went back to the Bible, so all constitutional questions in regard to education went back to the great case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, in 9 Wheaton. I undertake to say that the Supreme Court of the United States decided in that case that while the National Government could aid the States in carrying out the jurisdictional powers reserved by the States in the formation of the Federal compact, it could not go into the States and interfere with the machinery by which those powers were carried out. That decision was made in regard to statutes found in 1 Statutes at Large, pages 474 and 619, and in regard to the State power of quarantine. In the first place, let us look—and I will not weary the Senate—at the general proposition laid down by the court in regard to such powers as are claimed to-day to exist in the National Government. Says the court:

The object of inspection laws is to improve the quality of articles produced by the labor of a country, to fit them for exportation; or, it may be, for domestic use. They act upon the subject before it becomes an article of foreign commerce or of commerce among the States, and prepare it for that purpose. They form a portion of that immense mass of legislation which embraces everything within the territory of a State not surrendered to a general government, all which can be most advantageously exercised by the States themselves. Inspection laws, quarantine laws, health laws of every description, as well as laws for regulating the internal commerce of a State, and those which respect turnpike roads, ferries, &c., are component parts of this mass.

Here the court declares emphatically and distinctly that the General Government has no control over inspection or quarantine laws, but those are reserved to the States respectively. Now says the court:

The acts of Congress passed in 1796 and 1799, empowering and directing the officers of the General Government to conform to and assist in the execution of the quarantine and health laws of a State proceed, it is said, upon the idea that these laws are constitutional. It is undoubtedly true that they do proceed upon that idea; and the constitutionality of such laws has never, so far as we are informed, been denied. But they do not imply an acknowledgment that a State may rightfully regulate commerce with foreign nations or among the States; for they do not imply that such laws are an exercise of that power or enacted with a view to it. On the contrary, they are treated as quarantine and health laws, are so denominated in the acts of Congress, and are considered as flowing from the acknowledged power of a State to provide for the health of its citizens. (Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheaton, 203, 205.)

In the former portion of this decision the court had already laid down most emphatically that the health laws of a State could not be interfered with by the National Government; that that was a portion of the great mass of reserved powers remaining in the States after they had delegated others to the General Government. But the court says further in regard to these statutes, in which the United States Government directed its officers to assist a State in the execution of its health and quarantine regulations, that the General Government could assist a State in carrying out its own laws, but could not possibly bring laws of its own to enforce them upon the States in regard to that subject. But, says the Senator from Ohio, the State need not take the money; the State can refuse it. If the General Government has no right to impose its will upon the State in regard to the system of education or in regard to the system of health laws or quarantine laws, no matter what the State agrees to, the power does not exist and can not exist in the General Government.

Sir, it is not fair to state that the power to make regulations is not an absolute control of this whole subject by the General Government. Look at it in absolute practice. Suppose that the General Government should say to a State, "Here are $5,000,000 for the education of your children; but you must appoint a superintendent 30 years old, who has resided in the State for five years, who shall inspect personally every school district, who shall have reports made to him every six months; you shall expend so much money; you shall have teachers who are of a certain age, who have such qualifications, who shall teach school for eight months in the year." Is not that absolute control? If you grant for an instant that the National Government has the right to make one single condition you grant the power in the National Government to control the school system absolutely in all the States.

It is a mere quibble—I say it respectfully—to tell me that the States can take this donation or not at their own will. I say the General Government has no right to put conditions upon its grant. It can assist the States, as it may in regard to quarantine laws under the decision in Gibbons vs. Ogden. It can say to the State, "Here is so much money or so much land; take it;" but when it comes to say upon what condition you shall take it, that you must apply it so and so, in such a fashion, at such a time, under such limitations, then I say the Constitution of the United States is violated, which in its whole spirit, scope, intent, and meaning says that the States shall control the system of education in their own way and according to their own pleasure.

We have heard frequently here that this is a temporary system; that this is to last but for a time; that this is only for a few short years, in order to relieve this enormous burden of ignorance pressing upon the people of the United States. When was it ever known that $105,000,000 was given to any system and then let stop? You might as well tell me that the man whose system has become inured and accustomed to a terrible stimulant, who is poisoned with alcohol, who is drenched with chloral, whose brain and nerve and heart and blood are all subjected to the demon, will step up voluntarily and say, "Give me no more; give me water, but no more of the agency that is sapping my life and destroying all my hopes here and hereafter."

I tell you that this system, if it is established, is here forever. It never was known that a system like this terminated after it was once begun. How often have we seen it around this Capitol, when these advances were made, these steps honored through a breach in the Constitution, almost imperceptible at first. We started here a little agricultural department. Look to what enormous proportions it has grown. Year after year it has demanded more (I say nothing about the policy; I speak of the fact), until to-day from one end of the Union to the other almost the clamor comes up, "Make this a department of the Government, and the head of it a Cabinet officer." Will you pour $105,000,000 of artificial stimulus into the educational system of the respective States and then tell me that it will stop? It will never stop until this Government ceases to exist. At the end of the time these same States will be found here without self-dependence, looking to the National Government, looking away from their own energies and their own self-respect, and will cry out like the daughters of the horse-leech, "More, more, more!"

Sir, I can not say more emphatically than I do now with my whole heart and soul that when the time comes that the people of the respective States shall look away from themselves to the great National Government for assistance under a clause of the Constitution which our fathers made so plain that the wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err in regard to it—when that time comes there will be nothing left to quarrel over in regard to this Government.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, I do not rise to reply to the argument or the oration of the Senator from Missouri at this time. I suggest to him that there is something of a false analogy in that which he has just stated to the Senate. The difficulty is that those sections of our country where illiteracy now so largely abounds are already accustomed to the deadly habit of partaking of the poisonous decoction of ignorance to too great an extent. They do have the fatal habit to which he alludes, and the proposition of the bill is to substitute a more healthful form of drink. We propose to give cold water, and to substitute it immediately according to the necessity, and gradually we suppose that as the patient is cured the patient will himself, accumulating as is the inevitable result of temperance and sobriety and industrious habits, gain the means wherewith he will supply his own necessities of intellectual food and drink. The analogy is a false one.

So far as the Senator's concluding remarks are concerned, he is entirely at fault in regard to the question of the constitutionality of this bill. That appears to be conceded almost universally upon both sides of the Chamber, and it seems to me to be a waste of time to argue on that subject more. No one has yet been able to show that the premises laid down in the opening of this debate and repeated by almost every Senator who has spoken upon the constitutional aspect of this question were wrong, that intelligence is an indispensable condition to the existence of a republican government, whether it be the National Government or the State governments; and that being an indispensable, primary, fundamental condition, upon which the structure of the State governments and the National Government alike must rest if either exists republican in form, that assumption being correct, it is constitutional to do that without which the Constitution itself can not exist. The right of self-defense seems to be inherent, and if intelligence is indispensable to the existence of National and State Government alike, it is an absurdity to reason that it is unconstitutional to do that which is indispensable to the existence of the nation or the State.

Now, coming to a speech which I made on a former occasion when the returns of the census were fresh, when I had collated them as the result of my own personal effort and had been alarmed and shocked like the Senator, like everybody who had examined them at all, and when I made a mistake in some of my deductions and incorporated that mistake in my speech, I am willing to admit all the Senator says. It was a mistake, and by some lurid rhetoric involved an incorrect deduction in the matter of degree. Truthful it was so far as the evil itself is concerned, but untruthful as a statement of the degree to which it existed. I do not suppose that the Senator would think of holding either himself or any one else quite to the standard of mathematical strictness in the use of the English language if his feelings were somewhat excited. I think the Senator may find perhaps in his own experience as a speaker and orator, on reviewing what he may have said, that occasionally he has somewhat overstated, from the impulses of an active imagination overexcited at the time, the absolute, strict, and impartial proportions of the subject with which he was dealing. I am free to say that I have no doubt I did so; but I did not err to the extent to which the Senator seems to think; at least I believe not; and if I erred I gave the figures, I gave the census, I gave the same data to the public that I had acted upon myself; and if there is only one man in the United States, the superintendent of public instruction in the State of New Jersey, who has discovered my error, it is not I think fair to reason that I was to a very great extent at that time negligent in my examination, for the public have had those figures from then until now.

The figures which the census contains, and which I used on that occasion, are the sworn returns of the census itself. Those returns give the actual school population. They do not include the infants of 5 years of age and less, but the school population, those included within the ages in the several States who are expected to attend school, whose attendance upon school is contemplated by virtue of the legislation of the States themselves. The school population of course varies in different States, and the extremes are greatest between 5 and 21 years of age. I think there is one State where they are between 4 and 21. They vary from that, which is the largest extent of lifetime included in the school age, down to 6 and 14, I believe, or 8 and 16, or 8 and 15. The entire number enrolled, as the returns show, that is, the entire school population included in those ages, is, by the census, 15,803,535. That is the entire number that in contemplation of law should be attending the schools of the various States. The actually enrolled in the year 1880 (that is to say, those who actually attended the schools that year) numbered 9,780,773. As the Senator will perceive, less than two-thirds actually attended of those who were within the school ages of the States. The average daily attendance for the year was only 5,804,993; that is to say, of the pupils included within the school age throughout the United States there was an average attendance of less than one-third. If there is reason in the laws of the various States which contemplate a common-school education as being obtained during the period covered by their laws, it is certainly a most unfortunate and startling commentary to say that the children of the United States, judged by their actual daily attendance, are deriving only one-third in mass of that degree of education which in contemplation of law it is supposed they should acquire.

It is very true that when you come to examine the distribution of such education as is considered by the laws of the various States as a necessity, in order to fit the children of the country for a suitable discharge of the duties of life, the education acquired is in the aggregate about one-third of that which should be acquired, and it is so distributed that there are not probably in the city of Saint Louis 50,000 children growing up in absolute ignorance, and of course I was wrong in regard to that, but the evil is disseminated throughout the entire mass; and to the nation, to the mass at large, the evil is as startling as I stated it to be. I say that the children of the American people to-day are receiving just about one-third of the education which in the contemplation of the laws of the several States they should receive to qualify them for the duties of life. I am sorry that I drew an erroneous deduction, but I did do so, and I take the first opportunity during the debate to call attention to it and to correct it.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator permit me to call his attention to another statement? I did not refer to those statistics in order to make any personal attack on the Senator.

Mr. BLAIR. I did not understand that to be the case. The criticism was very just.

Mr. VEST. For I knew the Senator would do what he has done; that if he had made any mistake he would rectify it. I am glad to state that.

I understood the Senator to say yesterday (I neglected to mention it in the remarks I made), when the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] was on the floor, that there were only 500,000 children in the United States in private schools. Is that the Senator's statement?

Mr. BLAIR. The census returns show the number of pupils in private schools to be 567,160. The table from which I made my former statement was one that was prepared and furnished to me before the final footing-up of the returns, and was understood to be substantially correct, and, if I remember, that table stated the number at a very little over 500,000; but the figure I now give is the final footing-up. It is less than 600,000 according to the census.

Mr. VEST. I wish to call the attention of the Senator, irrespective of the census, to a simple fact which is known, I presume, to every Senator present, that the Roman Catholics in the United States do not send their children to the public schools; that as a matter of religious duty at least they think they should not attend those schools; and I am utterly amazed to hear the statement even from the census or anywhere else that there are only 500,000 children in the United States in private schools. I undertake to say that if the fact is ascertained it will be found that there are that many children of Roman Catholic parents who on a question of religion do not attend the public schools.

Mr. BLAIR. It is not worth while, and I will not quarrel with the Senator over a million or two. There are 20,000,000 children in the United States of school age, I think, at the present time. If you could get at the exact number, I believe there are over that at the present time. We must have an aggregate population of at least 56,000,000 to-day, and making all allowance for any mistake or omission of that kind on account of the Catholic children being instructed in Catholic schools (the more of them the better), it would be utterly impossible from these mathematical statements for us to form anything like a really adequate conception of the evil of illiteracy as it exists in this country.

In regard to the matter of Catholic schools I wish to state that I had a conversation during the last summer with a Catholic priest, a very intelligent gentleman, on the sidewalk of I think Mulberry street, in New York, or one of the streets in the lower part of New York. He was much interested in schools, and he told me that there were in that very assembly district over 2,500 children who so far as he knew had no opportunity of attending school anywhere, either in the schools furnished by the Catholic Church or the common schools of the city or anywhere, who so far as he knew were growing up in this absolute ignorance that would be discreditable in the jungles of Africa, certainly so in the city of New York.

The table to which the Senator has alluded and the statement which I then made in reference to the condition of things in our large cities was I think in substance just. I to-day believe that there is as much danger to the institutions of this country growing out of the illiterate condition of the great cities in the North as there is from the illiteracy of the Southern States; and what I then said was in illustration and enforcement of that fact, if it be a fact. There is no great city in the North that does not control practically the State in which it is situated and perhaps some of the adjoining States. Take the great city of New York, with Connecticut and New Jersey lying close, and in the influence of that city practically, and in the political influence of that city, it is almost a controlling power, as the center of the population surrounding it. Suppose the other States are left entirely out of the calculation, there is no question that the illiteracy of the city of New York will control the State of New York to-day, and the result in the State of New York in any national election is understood to be decisive. What is true of the State of New York would be equally true of the State of Ohio, or of the State of Missouri, or of Illinois as to the influence of Cincinnati, Saint Louis, and Chicago. There is no one of the national elections, so closely contested as they are, which is not at the disposal of the ignorant vote in any one of the great cities of the North. I venture to make that assertion, and if it shall turn out in the end that I am mistaken in regard to it I shall be exceedingly glad; but I think there is some history that illustrates and enforces that proposition outside of the figures of the census.

I have here a communication from Johns Hopkins University, which I received this morning, and have kept my eye out for a Senator from Maryland to present it. I will present it with the leave of the Senators from Maryland and have it incorporated as a part of my remarks and read to the Senate. It is signed by the president and every officer, I think, of the institution. It was forwarded to me by the superintendent of education, Hon. Mr. Newell, of the State of Maryland. I ask the Secretary to read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE). The paper will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and
House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The undersigned respectfully pray for the passage of Senate bill No. 398 to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools as amended by the Committee on Education and Labor; and they beg to submit the following reasons:

First. Because the right of the National Legislature to aid and encourage education has been established by a long series of precedents, beginning almost with the foundation of the Government.

Second. Because many States are in sore need of such aid, and that through no fault of their own.

Third. Because Congress is able to give the needed aid without imposing additional burdens on the people.

Fourth. Because the provisions of the bill under consideration will insure the greatest help where it is most needed.

Fifth. Because the bill does not propose to establish national schools under the supervision of the National Government, but simply to aid the several States in supporting their State school systems under State officers.

Sixth. Because the aid thus extended is to be temporary and will cease at a time when it may be presumed that it will be no longer needed.

Seventh. Because the bill provides a reasonable and sufficient guarantee that the money distributed under it will be expended in good faith for the purpose intended.

For these reasons, and because the various details in the amended bill now before the Senate have been long and carefully considered, your memorialists respectfully ask that the bill be passed substantially as reported from the Committee on Education and Labor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire desired to have the paper read only as a part of his speech, the Chair understood.

Mr. BLAIR. Only as part of my remarks. It is signed by the entire faculty, as I understand, of one of the leading institutions of the country, and is the result of action taken since this debate commenced.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the measure is far above all ideas having their origin in partisan bitterness or sectional prejudice.

I have no argument to make with those whose conceptions of right in great questions of public policy or of proposed beneficent results measure new policies by vindictive reference to the past or to the origin and history of African slavery, nor with those who believe that the white people of the Southern States, whether poor or rich, are degraded and ignorant.

To those who see in themselves and their own surroundings nothing but excellence, and perceive nothing of glory, honor, high character, and devoted patriotism in the political, social, and religious history of the people of the Southern States, it is useless to address either argument or remonstrance.

But their judgment is not the judgment of the intelligent and thoughtful people of this country, North or South. They love both South and North, and find nothing ignorant, repulsive, or degraded in the men and women either of the South or North.

What matters it to us here and now what was the cause of slavery or who was to blame? It does not concern the consideration of this measure what was the relative proportion of white persons in the Southern and Northern States who could not read or write in 1850, or what was the cause of such proportion.

It matters not whether it was slavery or the peculiar features and pursuits of the country which led to its sparse settlement and prevented public schools. I shall not enter into the subject. Let those who have a fancy for it indulge in this declamation. I am content with the knowledge that a brave, virtuous, and religious people, with less of crime and more of generous virtues than communities who could show a larger proportion of those who could read and write, have lived in these Southern States from the beginning of their settlement until the present time, and that there are but few who have been connected with them or have known them who do not cherish with pride and pleasure the memory of this connection. I pass from this subject without further remarks to answer the objections to this bill.

It proposes an appropriation for ten years from the national Treasury in aid of education to the several States. Beyond this Congress this act must rely on the exercise of the legislative power of succeeding Congresses to give it effect, and we can in no way bind any succeeding Congress in the exercise of their power of appropriation. It is, except as it now appropriates money, nothing more than a legislative declaration of the opinion of this Congress as to an important object of public policy which must rely on public opinion and future Congresses for its continuance. As such I accept it.

I shall therefore consider it as a bill making an appropriation of $15,000,000 to the States in aid of education.

OBJECTIONS TO THE BILL.

It is objected that there is no power in the General Government to make such an appropriation; that the policy is a vicious one in that it will make the States dependent on the National Government; that it will make the people of the States indifferent in their exertions to raise money by State taxation for purposes of education; that the conditions of the gift are an invasion of the power of States in that they prescribe what books shall be used and what branches of learning shall be taught.

These are the important objections. The proportions of aid which different Senators favor are not so important, as they admit and support the principle of the bill.

NO PLACE FOR RESENTMENTS.

Mr. President, I heard with a great deal of pleasure the defense of the bill made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], who spoke day before yesterday. In his speech he said that if we were to take counsel of our resentments we might perhaps draw some conclusions which were distrustful of the efficacy of the bill. It might be said with a great deal of truth that upon both sides this sentiment should have force with respect to all our acts of legislation I concur with him that it is not a subject upon which we should allow our remembrances of the past or any resentful feelings which may originate out of them to have any place here, it has been with great gratification that I have observed that upon the other side of the Chamber there has been in many instances an entire forgetfulness that there was anything in the past history of this country which had created a feeling of prejudice or distrust in the consideration of the questions pertinent to this measure, which proposes the appropriation of $15,000,000, and annually thereafter of a diminishing sum for ten years, to be given to the States in proportion to their illiterate people over ten years of age, for their education in the elementary branches of learning.

This subject is far above and beyond the reach of resentments or of prejudices. It is entirely removed from the region of party feeling or sectional prejudice. The time has passed when with the people of this country either North or South there can be a feeling of distrust or prejudice created because of their sectional residence or because of the war or the facts which grew out of it. They marry and intermarry, and form business and social and political relations, and are the same in all respects as if they were the people of the same section or State, and it is not within the power of any man or party to create distrust in the people of one section of those of the other.

DISTRUST OF STATES IS DISLOYALTY.

Mr. President, we are dealing with a great public question, a question on which we can not impeach the character of the people of any State. If it be true that any State within this Union can not be trusted to perform the constitutional duties and functions which are imposed upon it under our form of government, then the impeachment is not of the people of that State but of the Government of the United States, of the Constitution and form of government under which we live, and it is quite as much an act of secession fatal to the Union and disloyal to the Constitution for us to impeach and by legislative action to control and direct the exercise of its powers by a State within the scope and limit of its constitutional functions as was the armed secession of the Southern States.

We are bound by our fealty to the Government to accept and act on the entire capacity and good faith of that organism of States upon which our fabric of government rests for the continuance of this Union of indestructible States, and therefore although we may constitutionally exercise the power of appropriation in aid of this or other subjects of legislation, which are within the powers not granted to the United States and not prohibited to the States but reserved to them, we can only do it by aiding the State with its consent, leaving it free in the performance of its constitutional functions, and trusting to the honor and good faith of its people for the proper application and use of the means given to her. This is the sole and all-sufficient guarantee which our form of government has provided for the exercise by the States of all the great powers and trusts which are left to them, and upon which both personal rights and property depend.

CONGRESS DECLARES THE OBJECT OF APPROPRIATIONS.

In the course of the discussion on the constitutionality of the bill I have been surprised at my distinguished friend from Missouri, whose mind is so acute and whose expression of his ideas is so admirable, that he should express the opinion that there is any reason why the Government of the United States, when making a donation of money or of any other property under its power of appropriation, may not declare the object to which that donation shall be applied. Why, sir, there is not a land-grant that has ever been made to a State to aid the construction of a railroad which has not affirmed that it was for the specific purpose of building that road, and failing in that, that it should return to the Government. There can be no act of giving without designating the purpose, unless it be a general gift without any special purpose, and it is no surrender of the independence of the donee in accepting that gift to agree to use it for its declared purpose. Why? Because the act of donation is not an exercise of power, but is an acknowledgment of the right of the acceptor to refuse or reject. It is an acknowledgment, a recognition, that it is not within the scope of power exercised as power, but that it is a free gift, requiring the assent of the party accepting. Even Mr. Calhoun, the great advocate of State rights and the most limited construction of the powers of the National Government, made a report in favor of the passage of a bill for dividing all the public lands between the States—with several conditions imposed by Congress on the States—and providing for the assent of the States to these conditions.

It is therefore true that in the history of this country, as was stated the other day in relation to the appropriation in aid of the interstate commerce of the country upon the resolution of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], that Mr. Monroe, in his construction of the Constitution, expressly affirmed that the power of appropriation was not restricted or limited to the specific grants of the Constitution. And I heard with surprise the distinguished Senator from Texas affirm as an undeniable proposition that there could be no power in the Government to make this donation, this gift to the States, in aid of education or any other purpose, without assuming to themselves the authority and power of carrying it into effect, of invading the territorial jurisdiction and sovereignty of the States in enforcing that power.

How will assent to a condition attached to a gift that it shall be used by the donee in his discretion for a certain lawful object, which is in the interest both of the giver and the accepter, destroy or affect the independence of the latter? I fail entirely to perceive it or to understand the processes of argument which reach such a conclusion. The Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] finds power in the Constitution to give the public lands to the States for education or otherwise in the clause which authorizes Congress to dispose of the public lands. But, unfortunately for the argument, the power to dispose of the "other property" of the United States is given by the same clause, and the money of the United States is certainly property of the United States; and by his own argument the Senator finds an express warrant to dispose of or give this money property to the States. The Senator from Missouri finds a violation of the reserved rights and powers of the States in the condition imposed on the gift—that the States shall agree to use it for the teaching of certain branches of learning.

This would certainly be true if the act was an exercise of power to this end, and the State would have no power to consent to such an exercise of power within her territory. It would be quite as much in principle a surrender of her essential power, quite as much a withdrawal from the Union of "indestructible States," as was the act of secession. But the exercise of the power to teach reading and writing in a State, and the recognition of the right of a State to agree to teach them or not teach them, is as different as anything in reason or nature, and this is all that will be done under this bill if it becomes a law.

NO POWER IN THE GENERAL GOVERNMENT.

The Senator from Texas finds it an undeniable proposition that if Congress has power to give money to the States in aid of education, therefore it would have power to impose and prescribe the conditions of education and establish or prohibit it without the consent of the States; that is, the power to give carries with it the power to force—consent carries with it the consequence of surrendering the right of consent and the obligation of submission to force. If it has power to give money to the States for education, they have the power to force the States to use the money as they may prescribe, and by law to command that children of all ages, sexes, and conditions shall sit together, associate together, and be taught together.

Therefore as the power to do these things interferes with the reserved power of the States, and not being granted to the United States nor prohibited to the States nor implied, it can not exist.

This conclusion is certainly undeniable if the premises are true; but they are not true. The power to give does not carry with it the power to force; on the contrary, it concedes the right to accept or to refuse to accept. It acknowledges the complete independence and the reserved right of the States to be in this respect exempt from the power of the Government. The undeniable proposition of the Senator from Texas, if true, assumes and demands that every power vested in the National Government shall be absolute, and without qualification or limitation. But this is not true either in reason or fact. Why may not any power of Government, whether in the States or the United States, be limited or qualified?

What ground is there for such a conclusion? Where in reason does it find its lodgment or resting-place? Power is not only in its nature susceptible of limitation, but in all parts of the Constitution power is limited. Congress has power to pass laws for the punishment of persons accused of crimes, but its power is limited by the inhibitions of the Constitution, and everywhere it is qualified by one great standing provision; and Senators who refer to the authority of Gibbons vs. Ogden will find that the principle of protection of the right of the States and of limitation of the power and authority of the General Government will have but little protection if it rests alone upon a denial of the power of appropriation outside of the express and implied grants of the Constitution. The Constitution contains as the great safeguard and principle of the separate power of the States and the General Government the declaration that all powers not granted to the United States and not prohibited to the States are reserved to the States, and therefore in the express and positive grants of the Constitution, and those which are implied properly, and in the power of appropriation, there is ground broad and large enough to confer every power necessary to provide for the general welfare and the common defense, saving only that none of them can ever be exercised in interference with but must always stop at the threshold of the reserved powers of the States.

No power of the United States can, then, be so exercised as to interfere with this reservation of powers not granted to the States.

TAXES AND APPROPRIATIONS.

Congress shall have power to lay and collect duties, imposts, and excises to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare.

It has been said that this language has no meaning except to declare that this power and right of appropriation is limited and restrained to the specific grants of power. The application of this idea to the text will demonstrate its truth or error. The reading which this idea makes is the following:

Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, &c., to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare by borrowing money; by regulating commerce with foreign nations and among the States; by establishing a uniform rule of naturalization; by bankruptcy laws; by coining money and regulating its value; to provide for punishment of counterfeiting; to establish post-offices, &c.

But it will be observed that the act of levying taxes and collecting money to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare is not in any way necessary to the act of regulating commerce, or establishing a rule of naturalization, or of coining money or regulating its value, or punishing counterfeiters, or defining and punishing piracies, or declaring war, or making rules for the government of forces, or organizing the militia. Any one of these acts of power may be performed without an exercise of the act or power of laying and collecting taxes. The payment of the debts, providing for the common defense and general welfare of the United States, although permitted by and dependent on the exercise of these enumerated powers in the performance of these several acts, is not limited to them, for it is expressly declared—

Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to carry into execution these and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, &c.

TWO GREAT PRINCIPLES OF GOVERNMENT.

The argument is that there is no power vested by the Constitution in the United States except that given by these foregoing powers, but the Constitution says, "all other powers" vested by the Constitution in the United States. Neither in reason nor by the text of the Constitution can this construction be sustained. This great instrument of government can not be interpreted and never has been interpreted on so narrow a basis. The Constitution contains two great ideas—certainly the wisest in themselves that human wisdom has ever devised. They were the outgrowth of time and circumstance, as well as the wisdom of man. Observing these, all persons who believe in our form of government, whether of the strictest or of a broad school of construction, will arrive at the same results; and while no rule of beneficent legislation or beneficial execution of power by either will be limited or interfered with, there can never be an intrusion of either on the sovereign powers of the other. These are the ideas of States and of united States in a national government, which is guarded by the provision that the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States are reserved respectively to the States or to the people. That is, all powers express or implied in the United States, or any department or officer thereof, are limited and restrained so as not to impair or affect the vital autonomy and rights and powers of the several States. The central idea of national power for national objects, and State power for State objects, which concern the internal polity of the States, demands that all powers and all execution of powers shall stop on this threshold.

Whatever, then, can be done in levying and collecting taxes to pay the debts and providing for the common defense and general welfare without controlling or interfering with the absolute right and power of the State to regulate and control her own internal polity and relations may lawfully and wisely be done. For what object would the limitation which the Senator from Texas insists on be made but for the protection of the rights of the States? It remains to inquire what part of the authority of the States, what right or reserved power, is violated or interfered with by a donation of money to aid in any work of improvement and by her acceptance or rejection of it. Why will she not, after such acceptance or rejection, have the same powers, and all the powers, and reserved rights she had before?

The rights of the States can never be affected by a consent or agreement on their part to exercise their sovereign power over education within their limits in establishing institutions of learning, or teaching their children to read and write, or agreeing to use money given to them for the industrial education of their people.

BENEFICENT USE OF POWER.

If this were true, then the acceptance of the conditions of the gift of the swamp-lands to the States, of drainage, &c., was a surrender of the territorial sovereignty of the State over these lands by the State to the National Government, for all of them stated this to be the object of the grant, and its acceptance and use was an implied acceptance of the agreement to the condition of the grant. If this be true, the acceptance of any land grant for education was a surrender of the power over education. If the powers of the United States are confined to making war, if the common defense and the general welfare can be provided for only by defense against violence, if no power of beneficence exists, they will prove inadequate to the needs of that incoming age whose great success is already heralded in the preservation of human life, and not in its destruction; in the increase of the sum of human happiness and comfort, and not in its diminution; in the institution of the beneficent causes which banish extreme poverty and want, which prevent and relieve pestilence and disease and famine.

In the development through applied science of all the economies on which abundant production and just exchange and distribution depend the higher and wiser civilization of the present and the coming age demands that all public powers shall be subordinated to and promote the great law, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." The end and object shall be to cure, and not to destroy; to bring comfort, ease, and abundance to all. To this end applied science unfolds the hidden powers of force in the elements and applies them to the needs of man; discerns the hidden causes of disease, pestilence, and want, and points with almost unerring certainty to the means and economies by which they may be prevented or staid in their advance. To accomplish these great ends wisely and well demands all the energies of the human race in that direction in which alone a divine economy has decreed they may be successfully exerted.

RIGHT TO GIVE AND ACCEPT.

But the right of appropriation, the right of giving, the right of accepting, the right of the State and the General Government to make a grant of property where there is no concession of power of one to the other subject to the condition of the performance of a particular act within the function and power of the State, I affirm has never been in practice denied. Such a consent on the part of the State to exercise her powers of legislation on a particular subject within her own limits and in her own internal affairs by applying money in aid of a special purpose is one of her reserved powers. Every grant to a State for a railroad, every grant in aid of education of this long column of 67,983,000 acres of the public lands of the United States, every one of them, has been accompanied with a designation of the purpose for which it was granted and with an either express or implied acceptance of that purpose and the obligation to carry it into effect.

Now, Mr. President, I dismiss without further consideration the idea that there is any support either in reason or in the history of this country in the proposition that there is no constitutional power for the exercise of this act of appropriation and of its acceptance and use by the States. We have been constantly met, as has been stated by the Senator from Arkansas, with objections on the subject of an interference with the rights of the States. Well, sir, if the rights of these States were imperiled by this or any other action, humanity might well stand aghast at the prospect of returning barbarism and war. The States are the foundation upon which the powers of the General Government rest, and I should be the last one to interfere with them. But there can be no reading of the Constitution made in which its express grants of power limit and confine its appropriation of money for any object within the range of the common defense and general welfare which does not invade the sovereignty and the reserved powers of the States.

The power to lay and collect taxes to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States is one power and will not read in connection with the other powers; as for instance "to define piracies and punish them" has nothing to do with laying and collecting taxes to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare. The evident intention of these specific grants of power and those implied was not to restrict the power of laying and collecting taxes to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare, but to limit and restrain Congress from exercising power within the limits of the reserved rights of the States. The limitation on the power of appropriations was the common defense and the general welfare. The limitation of the other powers is the express grant of them and their confinement to the expressed subjects of the grant, which are all so defined that they can not be extended to embrace subjects relating to the internal polity and the domestic affairs of the States. The distinction is broad and palpable, and behind it is the safeguard of the express reservation of all powers not granted and not prohibited to the States and the people thereof. What need was there in the interest of the protection of the States for restraining the discretion of Congress as to what is necessary for the common defense or the general welfare in the appropriation of the public money or in laying and collecting taxes?

I think it has been abundantly shown that this has been the construction placed upon this clause of the Constitution by all schools of construction in all the history of the country.

ILLITERACY IN THE STATES.

The Senator from Missouri has contended that this evil of illiteracy is greatly exaggerated. I have no doubt that is so. I have no doubt that the statistical information to be gathered through a bureau of statistics such as has been suggested by the great labor interest of this country would furnish the only reliable statistics. It needs no argument to discover to us that obtaining reliable statistics is a science, and requires elaborate, permanent, patient, continuous trained effort to gather the facts that will accurately exhibit the condition of a people. But so far as we have information on that subject the best and most reliable we have are the tables of the census, which in their enumeration expressly specify that a certain number of people over 10 years of age can not read or write; and those tables are approximately true at least.

I read from a paper prepared with admirable clearness and ability by a gentleman in the public service (Hon. Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky, of the House of Representatives):

Of the 50,155,783 people of the United States there are 6,239,958 over 10 years of age, 12.44 per cent., or nearly one-eighth of our entire population, who can not write. These illiterates are thus distributed:

|---|---|
| Illiterate whites in twenty-two Northern States | 1,272,208 |
| Illiterate whites in the eight Territories | 69,933 |
| Illiterate blacks in the twenty-two Northern States and eight Territories | 156,644 |
| Illiterate whites in the sixteen Southern States and District of Columbia | 1,676,939 |
| Illiterate blacks in the sixteen Southern States and District of Columbia | 3,064,234 |
| Total | 6,239,958 |

An analysis of these statistics shows that in eighteen States, including two Territories, more than 13 per cent. and in eleven more than 25 per cent. can not write. In fifteen States and Territories more than 11 per cent. of the white population over ten years of age can not write, varying in these from 11 to 45 per cent.

While no portion of the country is free from this scourge of ignorance, the condition of the Southern or former slaveholding States is especially lamentable and full of danger. More than one-fourth of the entire population of these States is illiterate.

Eight of these States—Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Virginia—have over 40 per cent. of illiterates of all classes, white and black. The whole number of persons, white and colored, in the sixteen Southern States was 18,508,000. Of these the number of illiterates was 4,715,395, or 27.1 per cent. This illiteracy is largely confined to the colored people, 47.7 per cent. of whom (3,220,878) can not write, while only 6.96 per cent. of the whites (3,019,080) are in that condition.

The total school population of the South was 5,659,660, of whom the number enrolled was only 2,973,944. In other words, there were 2,685,716 children who received no schooling whatever, or who attended only half the school period. It is safe to say that not more than one-half the school population in the South received an education covering the school age. But, in addition to the children, there are 1,354,974 males 21 years of age and upward who are illiterate.

Adding these to the children who attended no school, we have a grand total of 4,040,690 in the South who at present have no adequate educational advantages.

To lift this mass of ignorance to the plane of intelligence and usefulness is the problem which your committee has most faithfully, if not successfully, sought to solve.

In considering this question there are several propositions, some of which are self-evident, and all of which, it is believed, can be sustained by statistics and historic facts.

Thus it appears that Illinois expended per capita five times as much as Alabama; New York six times as much as Georgia; Massachusetts seven times as much as Mississippi, and California twelve times as much as North Carolina; or, if we compare the States as nearly alike in population, it appears that Alabama, with a population of 1,262,505, expended in 1880 for school purposes $375,465, while New Jersey, with 130,000 less population, expended $1,928,370, or five times as much; but the property of New Jersey was assessed at $606,415,561, while that of Alabama was only $120,000,000, or one-fifth as much. Thus, relatively, the two States were upon an equality, and Alabama taxed herself for education as heavily as New Jersey. So, also, Wisconsin, with about the same population as North Carolina, expends five times as much, but the property of Wisconsin was five times greater. A comparison of the other States discloses the same result. These statistics, while showing how great the educational needs of the Southern States are, also show that in proportion to their ability they have not been far behind other States of the Union.

Without external aid, therefore, the South, even with the utmost self-denial, can not educate her illiterates; nor will this excite surprise if the tremendous losses incurred there during the last two decades are taken into consideration. As the result of the war the South lost over $4,000,000,000. The enormous shrinkage of values in the individual States of the South is well known.

Since 1860 the population of Alabama has increased 31 per cent., while her assessed valuation has diminished 72 per cent. In Arkansas the population during the same period nearly doubled, while the sources of taxation have fallen more than one-half—twice the number to educate and only half the means for the purpose.

In seven of the Southern States—Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Mississippi, Louisiana, and South Carolina—the shrinkage of values has been over one-half, and in several of them nearly three-fourths. As further emphasizing this loss of values in those States, their condition may be contrasted with other portions of the country. The census shows that Indiana gained 77 per cent. in wealth, New York 91 per cent., New Jersey 93 per cent., Rhode Island and Illinois 102, Massachusetts 104, Pennsylvania 134, while some of the newer States gained from 217, as in Michigan, to 406 in Minnesota, and 1,120 per cent. in Nebraska. The examination of such statistics must substantiate the fact that no one State of the South, nor all of them combined, can satisfactorily solve the educational problem and save themselves and the country from the impending peril.

We have, then, these figures. The illiterate whites in the sixteen Northern States 1,272,208; the illiterate whites in the sixteen Southern States and the District of Columbia 1,676,939; illiterate blacks in the Southern States and the District of Columbia and Northern States about 3,220,000 over 10 years of age.

ILLITERACY, CRIME, AND PAUPERISM.

Mr. President, I have here a history of the progress of the world by Mulhall, which exhibits the connection of crime and pauperism with illiteracy with the absence of education, whether bad or good education, whether it is perfect or imperfect. This valuable book contains carefully tabulated statements of the statistics of different countries. I read from page 105 as follows, under the head of crime:

That public morality has risen in every country in the same degree as instruction is fully proved by the statistics of crime.

In Great Britain, for example, the annual convictions compared to population have fallen 60 per cent. in the last forty years. Similar results are true in a greater or less degree of other countries—

There is, moreover, a difference in the nature of offenses in various countries. In the North fraud, theft, and in infanticide; in the South, stabbing and highway robbery are most frequent. Mr Black gives the following comparative table of murder and stabbing in the various countries:

|---|---|
| United Kingdom, per million of inhabitants | 7.5 |
| Sweden and Norway, per million of inhabitants | 8 |
| France, per million of inhabitants | 8.5 |
| Germany, per million of inhabitants | 8 |
| Belgium, per million of inhabitants | 11 |
| Austria, per million of inhabitants | 16 |
| Russia, per million of inhabitants | 32 |
| Italy, per million of inhabitants | 57 |
| Spain, per million of inhabitants | 88 |

There is professedly a close relationship between poverty and crime, as shown by inspectors of prisons in Great Britain in their report:

Crime and pauperism fell from 1851 to 1853; rose from 1854 to 1857; fell from 1858 to 1860; rose from 1861 to 1863; fell from 1864 to 1866; rose from 1867 to 1870; fell from 1870 to 1872.

Doctor Meyr shows that in Germany, when the price of flour rises, there is an increase of emigration and robberies, but no connection with the rates of murders and assaults.

The administration of justice compared with population is twice as costly in some countries as in others. For example, in Italy 20 pence, and in France only 9 pence per inhabitant. The total expenditure for law courts and prisons in the United Kingdom is 40 pence per inhabitant, or a little more than we spend on schools.

On page 309, relating to Belgium, the thickest populated country in the world and one of the most prosperous, it is stated, the decrease of crime would seem to be the result of education. * * * How closely ignorance and crime are related is shown by the fact that 64 per cent. of the criminals could not read.

On page 121 I read the following instructive statements:

Local taxation has * * * increased remarkably in the last ten years, the expenditure growing in England as follows:

| | 1867-'68. | 1874-'76. |
|---|---|---|
| Public works | £6,218,000 | £9,595,000 |
| Poor relief | 7,419,000 | 7,681,000 |
| Interest on debt | 4,575,000 | 8,539,000 |
| Roads, markets, docks | 5,934,000 | 6,672,000 |
| Police | 3,219,000 | 3,749,000 |
| Schools | 42,000 | 2,200,000 |
| Charities, asylums | 2,830,000 | 441,000 |
| Total | 30,237,000 | 42,877,000 |

The local taxation has risen 133 per cent. since 1860, when it was £17,000,000, and seems destined to rise to a level with the imperial budget. The principal cities are more heavily taxed for local than for national purposes, and this is chiefly owing to the cost of these sanitary improvements and schools that have so notably "reduced mortality and crime."

We have the fact exhibited that in England and throughout Germany the decrease of crime has been nearly 50 per cent. since the establishment of a system of general instruction. We have the statistical evidence, approximately true, that in the United States there has been a large decrease of crime in proportion to the increase of general education in the States where it prevails most largely; so much so, that in the last twenty years the increase of education in this country has given to the United States the front rank; 19 per cent. being the number of the highest ratio in Europe, which I think is in Prussia, and the United States standing at the same figure.

EMPLOYMENT FOR LABOR DIMINISHES.

I shall not consider the advantages of education at length, but I will go a little further. We are confronted with a very remarkable fact, when we come to consider it, brought largely to the notice of the Committee on Education and Labor during the past summer. It is the effect upon the population of the country, upon its industrial classes, of the wonderful advance in labor-saving machinery that has been made in the past few years. I find that the total power now in use in the nations of France and Germany, the Low Countries, Austria, the United Kingdom, the United States, and other countries is equivalent to 13,071,000 horses; that the labor saved by the simple invention of the sewing-machine equals the work of 12,000,000 women working by hand. In the work from which I read, Mulhall's Progress of the World, it is stated:

In effect, the adoption of machinery and steam has given mankind an accession of power beyond calculation. The United States, for example, make a million sewing-machines yearly, which can do as much work as formerly required 12,000,000 women working by hand. A single shoe factory in Massachusetts turns out as many pairs of boots as 30,000 boot-makers in Paris.

That wonderful progress is everywhere throwing out of employment hundreds and thousands of people, and the remarkable fact is exhibited behind these great aggregate results that the statistics of other countries exhibit increasing pauperism and want of employment of the industrial classes, and they show a necessity for some means by which that great evil can be remedied, so as to make this saving of labor a beneficent blessing to mankind and productive of beneficent results alone, instead of evils corresponding in magnitude to its power for good.

INDUSTRIAL EDUCATION THE REMEDY.

It has been urged upon the Committee of Education and Labor by intelligent laboring people, by federations of labor, by representative men, that there has been found but one means by which this may be done, and that is by education; not only common-school education but industrial education; that education which turns the child from the school equipped and prepared to earn a living, to engage in diversified employments, not in some particular trade or part of a trade, not having learned merely to make the sole of a shoe or some part of a garment, some particular classification of a trade or some particular employment in a factory, but trained for industrial employment generally, educated for that. That is the only means we can discover by which there can be a just distribution of labor, upon which in a dense community the entire subsistence of the laboring people must depend, upon which a just remuneration of labor can be assured, and upon which the independence of the laborer can be safely predicated.

Education, I venture to say, is the only protection, not only in a political but in an economic sense of government. It is upon it that government must depend for its perpetuation, and I venture the assertion, which may be defended by the most logical and severe argument, that no government within the coming age can exist except upon the basis not only of a common-school education, but of an industrial education of its people.

We have now about 56,000,000 people. We may contemplate near at hand the time when 100,000,000 people will exist in this country, when the soil will be fully occupied, and we can not too soon prepare such an economic condition of things based upon intelligence and industrial education as will furnish comfortable subsistence adequate to the remuneration and the needs and comforts of our civilization to 100,000,000 people. You can not find it in your tariff nor in your system of exchanges. You must find it, important as these great subjects are, in other measures which will mold them and mold the face of the earth and control all economic forces with the same ease with which the gigantic machines the invention of the present age perform their appointed work. You must find the remedy for this difficulty in a proper distribution of labor, in the just remuneration of labor; you must find it in making the laborer independent by an adequate industrial education. We are far behind the most advanced nations of Europe, behind some portions of Germany, behind France, behind England, in that one essential thing of an industrial education for the millions of laboring people who by these new economies in this new industrial world are being driven from the occupation of the soil into the towns.

It has become a demonstrated fact that with the invention of labor-saving machinery there has commenced to be a concentration and accumulation into fewer hands of the territory, the soil of the country; that the economies of production under the system of labor-saving invention tend to give the advantage in production to the large farmer who employs his labor-saving machinery, and that now the tide of population, the tide of employment, is being driven from the country to the town by these economic causes

THE MERITS OF THE BILL.

Mr. President, in the light of these propositions, which are supported by statistics, which are well founded in the opinions and judgment of many calm and learned men, which the labor representatives themselves perceive, how important is it, not alone in a political sense but in an economic point of view, that this great lever of education beginning with the common school and continuing through the industrial school shall be aided and sustained in the only way in which it may be done, namely, in conformity with the principles of our government of States and of a national government, as this bill most effectually does. Upon it all men can unite, those who believe the Government has power as a consolidated and centralized power to reach out its hand upon any subject on which it may act into the reserved domain of State power, and those who believe, as the great majority do, in the rights and reserved powers of the States as a limitation in all its powers.

The bill is carefully prepared for the purpose of enabling men of different opinions as to the powers of the Government to stand upon it. It is prepared upon the theory that if you restored the Southern States to the Union under your reconstruction and gave them power to participate in your legislation on the great political and industrial interests of your Northern States, if you made them an integral part of the Union and with sovereign and equal powers like the other States, it would be a strange contradiction now to impeach your own action, and to deny the efficacy of your own institutions and the sufficiency of your own National Government under the Constitution.

In the interest of the laboring people and of the people who employ labor, for there is and ought to be no distinction of interest between them, I support this bill; but I had rather we had no means of educating them, that we were all left to struggle on by feeble efforts, than to have this Government marred or impaired. It is founded on principles, and its institutions are the outgrowth of time and circumstance, and you can not substitute for this Union of States a centralized, an absolute power, because that would be to destroy the power of the people.

Therefore I think this is a bill, whether we agree in the proportions upon which the aid shall be given or not, which can not be improved in these essential points. When that is said, it is no particular credit to the committee. The chairman has bestowed great care and labor upon it; but it has come from the careful consideration of a large number of intelligent persons who have voluntarily given without compensation their efforts and their time to the consideration of the question.

For one I believe that no more important act of legislation has ever been considered. I believe that if it becomes a law its beneficent results will be greater and extend further than any and all other measures in promoting the welfare of the people.

The people ought not and will not suffer, starve, and die—neither they nor their children. They will not and ought not willingly to be the victims of disease and pestilence, when enlightened policies of state and the discoveries of applied science will prevent it. The tenure by which wealth and property and power will exist must be its beneficent use for the advantage of mankind.

ECONOMIES OF A NEW WORLD.

These are the lessons which we are now learning from the rapidly unfolding economies of a new world. So far is our form of government and our distribution of powers between the States and the Federal Government from being unfriendly to them, that it is under our shelter and protection that they will find their highest development, avoiding carefully the exercise of power within the domain each of the other. Its powers of aid and encouragement are capable of indefinite application with entire safety to both, and to its most important factor, the States and their separate and reserved powers. Were these imperiled, humanity and science might well pause in their divinely ordained and splendid progress toward the relief of mankind from the direst calamities of the race—from want and pestilence and crime at the prospect of returning barbarism, and war and suffering under the despotism of consolidated and concentrated power.

I have not spoken of this measure in its special relation to the people of the African race in the Southern States. They have and will always have my earnest sympathies and efforts in behalf of every measure which has in view their real benefit and which does not look to making them the victims of partisan policies. They are an integral part of the body-politic, and must be cared for as others are; but this question is higher and deeper and broader than any question of race or color—it embraces humanity. It demands new industrial economies and requires an exercise of political power in conformity with these new interests.

Already invention has substituted in place of human employment machinery equal to the force of 13,000,000 horses. The sewing-machine does the work of 12,000,000 women, and every day new inventions dispense with human labor. Where are these to find employment and how obtain subsistence? We perceive how beneficent these great agencies are under wise public policies, but we also must observe that their power is equally great in increasing the sum of human misery without such policies.

No longer does a vast expanse of unoccupied land present itself to the citizen to attract him with a home and ease and abundance for himself and wife and children to turn his back on the town and the old settlements and the life of penury and hardship and want, even with the advantages of the school-house and the church, and flee into the wilderness. This has been the easy solution of many families' hardships and troubles, and, with European immigration and the advent of the railroads, has been the efficient cause of the rapid growth of the great States of the West and Northwest.

We have now a population of about 56,000,000 of people and must soon have 100,000,000; our soil will be occupied, and we are confronted with the problem of its occupation and use under economies which dispense with labor to a great extent, accumulate properties in the hands of a few, and drive the people with their families into the towns.

How will you meet these economic conditions of a beneficent and splendid progress, capable of conferring unlimited blessings if properly used, but unrelenting in its destructive power if not properly directed? Manifestly the child must be trained and educated for diversified labor. Education of the head and the hand must go together, so that both boys and girls, men and women, shall leave the school mentally and industrially equipped to take part in the new economies, and share in the abundance and ease and comfort which a Divine Providence has ordained to be their beneficent result. Tariffs and exchanges and equal and just taxation must ever be an important factor in these economies and deserve the attention of wise and thoughtful men, but compared with the importance of these questions they sink into an inferior place.

Invention, the applications of power, labor-saving machinery, applied science, and the distribution of labor are the new-born giants which will create demand and supply and mold and adjust all other forces with the ease and unobstructed progress with which one of their great engines performs its appointed labor. To be ready for this great problem no time is to be lost; before we are ready for them 100,000,000 people will require to be fed and clothed and comfortably housed, and the wants and the imperative needs and comforts of a new life supplied. The statistics show how, alongside of the wonderful progress and advance of the working people of England and other industrial countries in comfort, the ratio of pauperism grows.

Carefully prepared statistics will show everywhere beneath grand aggregate results the same consequences from the same causes. The energies of both the General Government and the States, each in its place, will find ample employment in the adjustment of these economies.

This great question can not be considered on the basis of party distinctions or resentments. It will not be confined to the colored race, nor to the white race, nor to teaching the people how to read or write, nor to the trammels of a political economy based on a condition of labor before electricity and the powers of the elements were made the servitors of man.

Six hundred thousand persons in the United States alone are now organized in labor associations for the purpose of mutual protection, and for the intelligent consideration of the causes, economic, industrial, and political, which concern the subsistence, comfort, and well-being of themselves and their families. These are associated with others in different countries, constituting a federation of labor throughout the world. They are giving intelligent thought to the consideration of all the great questions which concern labor, production, distribution, and exchange. They are subject to the imperfections, errors, prejudices, and extreme opinions which belong to men as individuals and in associations. They contain among their number many men who have accomplished a large success in the trades and in manufacture. They earnestly desire such a solution of these great economic questions as will benefit mankind.

Much of good result may be hoped for from these efforts if properly met by prudent and well-considered legislation on the part of the States and the General Government, each within the limits of its own powers, and much of evil from an attempt to force impracticable theories into the forms of law, and from the discontents which arise from conditions of discomfort and want and poverty unless these shall be remedied by wise legislation.

NECESSITY AND SUCCESS OF INDUSTRIAL EDUCATION.

The following statements of eminent men in regard to the necessity for industrial education are of great importance and deserve careful consideration.

Dr. Lyon Playfair, of England, in 1863, says:

I find some of our chief mechanical and civil engineers lamenting the want of progress in their industries and pointing to the wonderful advance which other nations are making. I found our chemical and even textile manufacturers uttering similar complaints.

The one cause on which there was most unanimity of conviction is that France, Prussia, Austria, Belgium, and Switzerland possess good systems of industrial education for the masters and managers of factories and workshops, and that England possesses none.

Dumas, a savant and senator of France and president of municipal council, assured me that technical education had given a great impulse to the industries of France.

In going through the exhibitions whenever anything excellent in French manufacture strikes the eye, his invariable question is, "Was the manager of this establishment a pupil of the Ecole Centrale des Arts et Manufactureurs?" and in the great majority of cases the reply is that he was. The best system of technical education of workmen is to be found in Austria, though the higher instruction of masters and managers is better illustrated in France, Prussia, and Switzerland.

Mr. J. P. Worth, June 3, 1867, says:

In the matter of primary education, England is well abreast of Austria, France, and Prussia. In the matter of all that tends to connect the workman with the artisan, Austria, France, and Prussia were clearly passing us.

In 1867 Edward Hatch says:

The want of industrial education in this country prevents our manufactures from making that progress which other nations are making. I found both masters and foremen of other countries more scientifically educated than our own.

Edmund Franklin, F. R. S., in 1867, says:

In the polytechnic schools of Germany and Switzerland the future manufacturer or manager is made familiar with those laws and applications of the great natural forces which must always form the basis of every intelligent and progressive industry. It seems that this superiority more than counterbalances the undoubted advantage which this country has in raw material.

James E. McConnell says in 1867:

It requires no skill to predict that unless we adopt a system of technical education for our workmen, we shall not even hold our own cheapness of cost as well as in excellence of quality of our mechanical productions. It appears to me government should take the matter in hand; the public funds should be forthcoming to establish these technical schools.

Capt. Frederick Beaumont, of the royal engineers, says:

There can be no doubt as to the immense strides foreign mechanical engineering has lately made, notably in France and Belgium, and by which they are rapidly overtaking Great Britain's industrial power. It is only when taken up by government that such an institution would assume proportions sufficient to be effective as a means of national education.

Mr. Scott Russell, of England, says:

Dissatisfied with our national progress, we have turned our minds to search for the cause of our deficiency. We find that during these years some nations have been occupied in diligently promoting the national education of various classes of skilled mechanical workmen for the purpose of giving skill to the unskilled and rendering the skilled more skillful. We find that some nations have gone so far as to have established in every considerable town technical schools for the purpose of teaching all the youths intended to be craftsmen those branches of science which relate most nearly to the principles of their future craft.

Workers in metal are taught the nature of the mechanical powers with which they will have to work and the chemical properties of the materials they will have to operate upon. Engine-builders are taught the principles of heat and steam and the nature of the engines they have to make and work; ship-builders are taught the laws of construction, hydraulics, and hydrostatics; and dyers and painters are taught the laws of chemistry and color.

All skilled youth are taught geometry, drawing, and calculation; and in many countries every youth who shows great talent in any department is promoted to a higher training school and there educated at the public cost. Besides these local schools other countries have technical colleges of a very high class for the education of masters and foremen in engineering, mechanics, merchandise, and other practical and technical professions.

In 1867 A. J. Mundella says:

I am of opinion that art and industrial education, without a thoroughly organized system of primary instruction, will not remove the danger which threatens our manufacturing and commercial supremacy. I trust it will not be deemed presumptuous if I lay briefly before you the result of my observation on a subject in which I have long been deeply interested.

The branch of industry with which I have been connected for thirty years past is the manufacture of hosiery. I am the managing partner of a firm employing 5,000 work-people, with establishments in Nottingham, Derby, and Loughborough, employing more than four-fifths of the number, and with branches at Chemnitz and Pausa, in Saxony, employing about seven hundred persons. In addition to the opportunities and experience which the superintendence of these establishments has afforded me, I have for many years past formed friendships with manufacturers in France and Germany. I have had free access to their warehouses and workshops, and I am as well acquainted with the progress of my own branch of industry in those countries as in England.

As the result of my observation I have for four or five years past been increasingly alarmed for our industrial supremacy, and my experience of the Paris exhibition has only confirmed and strengthened my fears. In my own branch we still maintain the lead in the majority of articles, but the progress made by France and Germany since 1862 is truly astonishing, and it has been much greater than our own.

I am of opinion that Englishmen possess more energy, enterprise, and inventiveness than any other European nation. The best machines in my trade now at work in France and Germany are the inventions of Englishmen, and in most cases of uneducated workmen; but these machines of English invention are constructed and improved by men who have had the advantage of a superior industrial education. The largest hosiery machine-shop in France is that of Monsieur Tailbours, at St. Just; models of all the best English machines have been purchased and imported, and they are there improved and constructed on thoroughly scientific principles under the superintendence of a young man who, I was informed, took high honors at the school of the government in Paris.

Precisely the same thing is taking place in Saxony, but the Saxons are, in respect of education, both primary and industrial, much in advance of the French, and in my branch they are our most formidable rivals.

In Nottingham, where the best machinery in the world is required and used in the production of hosiery and lace, there is no such thing as industrial education, and, greatly as it is to be desired, I am acquainted with many good mechanics and superior workmen to whom it would be of no service, inasmuch as they can neither read nor write.

The contrast between the work-people of England and Saxony, engaged in the same industry, is most humiliating. I have had statistics taken of various workshops and rooms in factories in this district, and the frightful ignorance they reveal is disheartening and appalling. I was born and educated among the working classes, and all my life have been in close association with them, but I never realized the condition of the lower masses of our work-people till I took the pains to examine them personally in the manner I have indicated.

In Saxony our manager, an Englishman of superior intelligence and greatly interested in education, during a residence of seven years has never yet met with a workman who can not read or write. And not in the limited and imperfect manner in which the majority of English artisans are said to read and write, but with a freedom and familiarity that enables them to enjoy reading and to conduct their correspondence in a creditable and often superior style. Some of the sons of our poorest workmen in Saxony are receiving a technical education at the polytechnic schools, such as the sons of our manufacturers can not hope to obtain.

While, therefore, I believe that the English workman is possessed of greater natural capacity than any of his foreign competitors, I am of opinion that he is gradually losing the race through the superior intelligence which foreign governments are carefully developing in their artisans.

The influence of strikes and lock-outs has been undoubtedly against industrial progress. But the worst practices of trades-unions are the result of the gross ignorance of the majority of workmen who are connected with them. I succeeded nearly seven years ago in forming a board of arbitration and conciliation for the hosiery trade of this district, and no strike has taken place since its formation.

Leicester has recently followed our example, and during the past week the lace trade has done the same. This is the only solution in my opinion of that difficulty.

The education of Germany is the result of an organization which compels every parent to send his children to school, and, after having laid the foundation of a sound education, affords to all those who have the capacity and inclination the opportunity of acquiring such technical knowledge as may be useful in the department of industry for which they are destined.

If we are to maintain our position in the industrial competition, we must oppose to this organization one equally effective and complete. If we continue the fight with our present voluntary system, we shall be defeated. Generations hence we shall be struggling with ignorance, squalor, pauperism, and crime; but with a system of education made compulsory, and supplemented with art and industrial education, I believe within twenty years England would possess the most intelligent and inventive artisans in the world.

James Young, in 1867, says:

I was a juror in the English exhibition of 1862, but in the French exhibition I am only an exhibitor; as such I have spent about a month in Paris studying the exhibition, and there had the opportunity of meeting many jurors of different nations. I am bound to say that my experience accords with that of Dr. Lyon Playfair. So formidable did the rate of progress of other nations appear to many of us, that several meetings of jurors, exhibitors, and others took place at the Louvre Hotel on the subject. The universal impression at these meetings was that the rate of progress of foreign nations in the larger number of our staple industries was much greater than our own.

But it must be stated that a large number of our first-class machine and other manufacturers are not exhibitors in Paris, whereas other nations, I believe, have taken care to bring forward their very best; still the great progress of other countries is evident. The reason for this increased rate of progress is the excellent system of technical education given to the masters of workshops, submanagers, foremen, and even workmen. England for a long time excelled all other countries in the finish of her machines; but now we find that foreign machine-makers are rapidly approaching us in finish, and having skilled and intelligent labor cheaper than ourselves, are progressing in all the elements of manufacturing.

Permit me to use my own case as an illustration. Originally I was a workingman, but have succeeded in increasing the range of manufacturing industry. The foundation of my success consisted in my having been fortunately attached to the laboratory of the Andersonian University in Glasgow, where I learned chemistry under Graham, and natural philosophy and other subjects under the respective professors. This knowledge gave me the power of improving the chemical manufactures into which I afterward passed as a servant, and ultimately led to my being the founder of a new branch of industry and owner of the largest chemical manufacturing works of the kingdom.

It would be most ungrateful of me if I did not recognize the importance of scientific and technical education in improving and advancing manufactures. Many men without such education have made inventions and improvements, but they have struggled against enormous difficulties which only a powerful genius could overcome, and they have been sensible of the obstacles to their progress.

Stephenson, who so greatly improved locomotives, had to be his own instructor, but he sent his son Robert to Edinburgh University, and the son did works at least as great as the father and with far less difficulty to himself. The improvement in locomotion has necessarily created great competition in the industries of the world, and unless we add skilled instruction to manual labor England can not expect to maintain her position in the industrial race.

I have made these extracts from a series of letters written by the managers and employers of labor in the great establishments in England, some of them men who have risen to positions of great prominence in the vast manufacturing interests of that kingdom. These letters were written in answer to inquiries addressed to them by authority of the Government of Great Britain.

They exhibit the fact that the progress of nations and the comfort of the laboring people, the just remuneration and the proper distribution of labor, depend on the best primary and technical education and its establishment as a system and its general use. I shall not pursue the subject further. If all our efforts were given to the great work what grand results might we not hope to see in a short time in all the States, and in the Southern States especially.

How many children, both boys and girls, furnished with the means of earning a comfortable livelihood; how the arts would flourish; how factories and industrial employments would increase and flourish; how agriculture and horticulture would assume lovelier and more productive forms; how happy, cultivated, contented, prosperous, and virtuous would be our people. These are the fruits, Mr. President, which we may reasonably hope for from the commencement and continuance of the policies which this bill proposes to inaugurate and aid.

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. President ——

Mr. GARLAND. Would the Senator from Mississippi prefer to go on this evening or to-morrow? If he will give way I will move an executive session.

Mr. LAMAR. I propose only to submit a few remarks; but I am willing to give way if such is the desire of the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. I wish the Senator from Arkansas would withhold his motion for a few moments.

Mr. GARLAND. Very well.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not desire to discuss this bill, but I propose to offer an amendment to it in the nature of a substitute, which I ask may be printed; and for the purpose of calling the attention of Senators to the amendment I desire to say just a word or two. It seems to be conceded upon both sides of this Chamber that the obligation, if there is an obligation, for an appropriation out of the national Treasury for purposes of education grows out of matters connected with the emancipation of the black race in the South. I say that seems to be conceded on both sides of the Chamber. I do not suppose there is a Senator here who would propose this bill or advocate it but for facts connected with the condition of the black race in the South.

Mr. President, by the bill which is under discussion we are proposing therefore to treat the evil of illiteracy as connected with the emancipated slaves, and in order to get at the particular difficulty which incites this legislation, which justifies it, we are proposing a system which distributes public money all over the United States without reference to the fact whether there are any emancipated slaves, and without reference to the fact whether the State in which it is to be distributed is in any way incapable of dealing itself with the question of education. In other words, we propose to give Massachusetts her share of this fund, though her Senators tell us that Massachusetts is amply able to deal with the question of illiteracy within her own borders, and that she has now a school system which sets before every boy and girl in that Commonwealth an open door to the acquisition of the elements of an education. That same thing is true in the State of the Senator who manages this bill upon the floor. It is true in the State I represent. There is not a boy or girl of school age in the State of Indiana that has not to-day an opportunity to acquire the elements of a common-school education. Why, then, shall we be under this bill distributing $5,000,000 to the States which are able to deal with this question of illiteracy, to the States which claim that they have already dealt with it and have now an ample school fund and plenty of schools and teachers to take care of their own children?

It seems to me that we should apply the plaster to the wound, and instead of wrapping the whole body in bandages we should bandage the diseased part alone. I shall therefore propose by this amendment that the appropriation made shall go to those States only which have at least 10 per cent. of illiteracy. I do not believe that it will be a benefit to the States of the North—take the State of the Senator who sits next to me, Ohio—to throw into that State for current use a part of this appropriation. If it could be added to the permanent educational fund in Ohio I agree that it might be valuable, because then it might go on; but if it is to be added only for a few years to a State where educational interest is already well-developed and where appropriations for education are already ample, it can not have the effect to stimulate, and is likely to have the effect rather to enervate.

Then, Mr. President, this amendment proposes that the amount to go to any State, as in the amendment to the bill which I proposed the other day, shall not be more than the State itself has expended in the preceding year for the purposes of education. I propose that the sum appropriated shall be less, that it shall begin with $5,000,000 annually, and that it shall not run more than five years. I do this because I believe the project is an experiment. The amendment I propose does not assume to make the appropriation, but simply provides that these appropriations shall be made from year to year.

Mr. BLAIR. That is the bill, the Senator will understand, now. It appropriates annually.

Mr. HARRISON. Very good; then in that respect it does not differ from the bill which the committee have reported. Certain conditions are prescribed on the part of the States in order to entitle them to the use of this fund. One is that the State shall not, after the payment of the first installment under this act, reduce the State assessment for common schools. Another is that it shall be distributed to the school districts or other territorial subdivisions, not according to the number of children attending school therein, but according to the number of children of school age within the district.

These are the general outlines of the amendment which I propose. I propose it as in the line of the remarks I made the other day, as being a sufficient provision for the experiment which we are about to try, and as bringing the money which is to be appropriated directly in contact with the evil which is to be remedied.

I do not know that the amendment is in the best shape. I shall not be tenacious, when the Senate considers it, if any changes in it may improve it. I have hastily prepared it, and I submit it to the consideration of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received and printed, and lie on the table until it is in order to present it.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to withdraw the amendment which I moved, if I can do so, in order that the amendment of the Senator from Indiana may take the place of it. I do not mean this amendment, but the one offered a day or two since. The amendment of the Senator from Indiana accomplishes the purpose which I had in view besides accomplishing other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Indiana that the question now is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] to recommit the bill.

Mr. PLUMB. Then I should not be entitled now to accept the amendment of the Senator from Indiana?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No amendment is now in order in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose that the motion to commit takes precedence; but if that is voted down, I asked the Senator from Kansas the other day to allow me to make an amendment which the Senator from New Hampshire was willing to accept, making the text of his bill more clear, but the Senator declined. I found afterward, on examining the rules, that my amendment took precedence of his by right, because his is to strike out the very words of the text which I propose to amend and insert something else. So I suppose whenever the motion to recommit is voted down my amendment will come first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair only holds that at this time no amendment is in order, the question pending being on the motion to recommit.

Mr. GARLAND. With the understanding that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] has the floor on the bill, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BLAIR. Before the question is taken I wish to say that it will be necessary for the——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas withdraw the motion?

Mr. GARLAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish merely to say—and it is an important thing to be understood—that it will be necessary for the friends of this measure to ask of the Senate somewhat longer sessions than we have been accustomed to during the week, to-day perhaps, certainly to-morrow, and I think it would be well that we should ask the Senate to complete action upon this bill during the day to-morrow; otherwise we may be obliged to have a session on Saturday, for early next week, perhaps on Monday, I am notified by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that he will report a bill from his committee which will occupy the attention of the Senate. This bill has been under discussion now nearly two weeks, and I judge from the amendments offered that we go constantly further and further from an agreement on its provisions. I think that before long it would be well to take votes and see where we are. While I do not want to urge that proceedings be prolonged to-night, still I think we shall have to ask the Senate to sit to a later hour than usual to-morrow evening at all events.

Mr. GARLAND. I renew my motion for an executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After forty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 27, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

SCHOONER DRUID.

Mr. STONE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for present consideration the bill (S. 1847) to authorize the issuing of a register to John S. McQuin and J. Warren Wonson for the schooner Druid.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there be issued, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, a register for the schooner Druid, built in Lunenburg, Nova Scotia, but now owned by John S. McQuin and J. Warren Wonson, citizens of the United States, and lying in the port of Gloucester, Mass., whenever the said McQuin and Wonson shall furnish the Secretary of the Treasury with satisfactory proof that the said schooner has been repaired in the United States, and that the cost of repairing her by her present owners is equal to double the cost of the said vessel to them when purchased.

Mr. HOLMAN. The reading of the bill was not heard distinctly on account of the confusion in the Hall.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again report the bill.

The bill was again read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read three times, and passed.

Mr. STONE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENSIGN L. K. REYNOLDS.

Mr. COX, of New York. By direction of the Committee on Naval Affairs I ask unanimous consent to report from that committee for present consideration the joint resolution (S. R. 26) granting permission to Ensign L. K. Reynolds, United States Navy, to accept the decoration of the Royal and Imperial Order of Francis Joseph from the Government of Austria. The joint resolution is for the purpose of permitting a gentleman who is going off on the Greely expedition to accept a decoration from the Austrian Government in recognition of his heroic conduct in saving several lives.

The joint resolution was read.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has the resolution been considered by a committee of this House?

Mr. TALBOTT. It has been considered favorably by the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I object.

Mr. TALBOTT. I think the gentleman will not object to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] being permitted to give an explanation.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from North Carolina withdraw his objection?

Mr. BRUMM. I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Several members called for the regular order.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 76, noes 6.

So (further count not being called for, and more than two-thirds having voted in the affirmative) the morning hour was dispensed with.

SWINE PRODUCTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, by unanimous consent, presented a report from the Committee on Agriculture, to whom was referred the message from the President of the United States, transmitting a report from the Secretary of State relative to the traffic in the swine products of the United States, with a resolution recommending an appropriation to remunerate the commissioners; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 10) for the relief of Henry I. Todd, late keeper of the Kentucky penitentiary;

A bill (S. 48) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations and to extend the protection of the laws of the States and Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes; and

A bill (S. 940) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be examined certain vouchers filed, or to be filed, by the State of Missouri, or her agent or agents, for sums claimed to be due from the Government of the United States on account of payments made by said State since April 22, 1882, to the officers and enlisted men of her militia forces for military services rendered to the United States in the suppression of the rebellion, as evidenced by the proper pay-rolls heretofore filed with, examined and accepted by, the Government of the United States, and to report to Congress.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. YAPLE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 215) reappropriating the sum of $125,000, not expended, for the relief of sufferers by the floods of the Mississippi River.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of bills raising revenue.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. DORSHEIMER in the chair.

WHISKY EXTENSION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole, and resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5265) to extend the time for the payment of the tax on distilled spirits now in warehouse. By order of the House all general debate upon the bill has been limited to one hour and a half. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is recognized to control one-half of that time.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill of graver consequence than any that has been considered by the House at this session, and if any gentlemen suppose that only the parties directly interested in the measure are watching its progress they will discover, when perhaps too late, their ignorance of the sentiments and wishes of the people.

I shall discuss this matter briefly, because it is well understood and has been thoroughly canvassed, in its phases and consequences, by each member. What I have to say will be on a higher level, I think, than any arising from a prejudiced view of the matter.

The legislation in reference to whisky, from its inception and throughout its existence, has been steadily in one direction, and that has been to make the manufacture of whisky in this country a monopoly. I say this with no disrespect to the gentlemen engaged in its production, many of whom I know and entertain a high respect for. But we must recognize as true the fact that the legislation of this country has established a monopoly, and has driven from this field of profit almost all the minor producers and business men of limited capital. This monopoly I consider a dangerous factor in our public affairs. As business men those engaged in the manufacture of whisky have my fullest consideration, and I am prompted by no unkind feeling toward them in my opposition to this bill, for if I could to-day relieve them by a repeal of the tax in toto, or by a partial repeal, they would have my warm advocacy and I would rejoice. What I fear from this measure is that it tends to make permanent the internal-revenue system that brings into our Treasury so large a proportion of our annual revenue. I abhor the system, and I stand against its continuance for a day longer than we can help; and therefore any act of legislation likely to perpetuate it I feel a solemn duty requires me to resist.

The excise law—

Said Thomas Jefferson—

is an infernal one. The first error was to admit it by the Constitution; the second, to act on that admission.

In corroboration of my view as to the danger of a continuation of the system as a permenent mode of raising revenue I can cite the extraordinary spectacle or anomaly which is presented in this matter of the parties in interest actually wishing to continue the tax. Some unusual and special advantage must be derived therefrom at the sacrifice, as I think, of the general public.

We are told this measure is made necessary by overproduction. Admit the fact. Have we not twice extended the period for the same reasons? Did the overproduction cease? I think not; on the contrary, after one of those extensions the evil was aggravated. Should the pending bill become a law, who knows that Congress would not be called on to again extend the time beyond the period it prescribes?

But the bill and the arguments by which it is supported open for thoughtful consideration the far graver question whether it is the right, and if it be the right whether it is the duty, of the Government to step in on any occasion, under any pretext, to relieve by special or class legislation manufacturers temporarily embarrassed. The same conditions might arise and the same or similar reasons be urged as to any other business, and if relief is right and is granted in one case, why not in all cases? And so our Government would become a paternal one, more injurious to all our people than can be conceived or has yet been dreamed of by the wildest constitutional latitudinarian. I can not think the passage of this bill possible, yet its defeat should be caused by a higher thought and purpose than any prejudice should arouse. Believing the measure as proposed wrong in principle, vicious in practice, most unwise in every respect, and especially so now, even in its consideration I have steadily resisted even its discussion, for the reasons I have given and many others I might give if I was not more anxious to reach a vote than I am to discuss the subject.

Mr. McADOO. In my opposition to this bill I am not actuated by any fanatical idea of temperance, as I am opposed to all sumptuary laws. It seems to me that the arguments which have been adduced on this floor against the passage of the bill from a purely temperance point of view ought not to have any weight. This is not a question of morals or police regulation of the liquor traffic. I think that so far as the temperance question is concerned Federal legislation should be directed more to securing for the use of the people a pure stimulant than in taxing production. In the hurry and the press, in the wear and tear of modern civilization, disguise it as we may, wisely or unwisely, the majority of mankind will resort to stimulants and narcotics.

I am opposed to this bill on the general principles of sound legislation. There have been but three classes of arguments in its favor presented on this floor. The first is that the men who are to be benefited by the passage of this bill are a good lot of fellows and need our sympathy. That argument merits no consideration. It may do credit to the hearts of those who offer it, but it is certainly a severe commentary on their heads.

The second argument is this: that the general law which oppresses these men is a bad one, and that we should, therefore, give them this special relief from its universal application. I think that is the strongest argument why this bill should not pass. For myself I am in favor of wiping out the whole internal-revenue system. It is not a question of experimental politics in my State. The Democratic party of my State put the question to the people of New Jersey, and the people declared by nearly 7,000 majority in the gubernatorial election against the entire system of internal-revenue taxes and internal-revenue collectors. The gentleman who has just sat down [Mr. RANDALL] argued against it from one end of New Jersey to the other.

I do not believe in voting for this bill, because if we grant relief to those who suffer under the internal-revenue system, and yet want to uphold it, we will never be able to wipe it out. I am glad we are discussing in this respect a question of taxation where, justly or unjustly, we can not be accused of acting in the interest of New York silk-ribbon jobbers or the English manufacturers of cheap razors and Soho-square pickles.

In abolishing the internal revenue we are carrying out the spirit of our free Constitution, making no experiment as to the result of indirect taxation, and freeing great sections of our common country from an excise regulation that fosters monopoly and is better fitted to the genius of a monarchy than a republic.

The bill being unsound on general principles, I do not think we are called upon to discuss its merits or the effect which a failure to pass it may have or not have on business interests. As a matter of fact these manufacturers, either through bad judgment or cupidity, overstocked the whisky market. They got caught as many other men have under similar circumstances, but, unlike any other business, they now ask Government to loan them a vast sum of money to help them out, and from past successes in Congress appear to have some hope that beyond the interest on such principal they may never have to pay anything in return.

This is a question which affects our own people solely. I do not want the incubus of this tax to remain upon the grain-fields of the Northwest or to continue its blight and shadow on the tobacco-planters of Virginia. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY] stated as an argument in favor of this bill that his sympathies were enlisted in its behalf because it is a Kentucky measure, and in that connection he spoke of the glorious history of that Commonwealth.

Sir, I do not yield to the gentleman from Maryland in my respect for the memory of Henry Clay or my admiration of the ennobling history of the Commonwealth of Kentucky. But I ask that gentleman to look across the historic river that flows beneath the shadow of this Capitol, and to remember that the great agricultural interest of the ancient, honorable, and glorious State of Virginia is tobacco, and to my mind certainly as legitimate a crop as is wheat. And I want him to help me to defeat this bill because of its defects and demerits, and to insure the abolition of a system which is not only blighting the commercial and material prospects of that great Commonwealth, but is seeking to run its politics and to ruin its people and is bringing disgrace and dishonor upon her honored name. I hope that this bill will not pass in the interest of good legislation. We ask that legislation shall be general, not special or class.

There has been another argument offered in support of this bill; that is, that in some mysterious way it is connected with the tariff. And the illustrious gentleman from New York who spoke yesterday afternoon [Mr. HEWITT] said he was in favor of making alcohol free because it was used in the arts and came under his catalogue of raw materials. Well, I am not opposed, as I have said, to the legitimate use of alcohol; but the principal art I know of in which whisky is said to be frequently used is the art of giving an aurora-borealis tint to the nose. [Laughter.] I do not know whether the gentleman from New York referred to that particular art in his remarks or not. But the gentleman is inconsistent. He would free alcohol and bond tobacco; take away from the poor man his pipe and leave him the cup.

I do not see that it is connected with the tariff. The newspapers, it is true, inform us that the tobacco men of Virginia and North Carolina have been offered a bait in the shape of a modicum of relief if they will accept a certain tariff bill now before the House. Now I ask gentlemen if that is not like inviting a man to a banquet and telling him that he shall have quail on toast, and then saying to him that before he can have any quail on toast to gratify his own palate he must eat a little crow to please you; that is, no crow no quail, no quail no crow? [Laughter.]

I do not propose to make any conditions. I think it is unmanly to hedge around a proposition with a condition of that kind. I am in favor of offering the tobacco men relief regardless of tariff legislation. I want in connection with this tariff suggestion to say to the leader on the Republican side, who spoke last evening and who threatened to dissolve his burly form in oleaginous laughter at the expense of the Democracy of the House—I want to tell the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] that the good old ship of the Democratic party, containing the church militant of the true political faith, notwithstanding these March gales, will yet come into harbor with the doves of sweet peace singing harmony on its yard-arms, and the old flag of the Constitution floating gallantly from its peak.

I want to tell the gentleman from Maine that the good sense of this great Democratic party will, in its own proper time, solve the tariff problem in the interest of the producing and laboring people of this land. I want to tell him that in the solution of it we shall be guided by the "greatest good to the greatest number;" and while we may not please a certain class of absolute free-trade theorists who think they have a first mortgage upon public opinion and that the great universe is sitting up in its night-clothes to hear them speak [laughter], nor on the other hand a class of advocates of overprotected capital and unprotected labor who are insisting because they themselves are amassing wealth that the American workingman is driving silver nails with a gold hammer and walking on luxurious carpets while his daughters are playing on thousand-dollar pianos, we will settle it to the interest and satisfaction of the people.

I want to tell him that there is a proper solution of the tariff question, and a proper time and place to discreetly and honestly examine the system in the interest of honest toil and economic government.

I know, sir, that some people affect to believe the tariff question can only be settled in heaven, where they have no "local issues," and no great editors to blow cyclonic blasts upon their bugle-horns, making window-panes rattle and the babies cry from the sylvan shades of the "blue-grass" region of Kentucky to the pebbly shores of my own delightful Jersey.

It may be the gentleman from Maine thinks it can be settled in the other place, where they have a prohibitory tariff not alone on cold water but upon the Democratic party, individually and collectively. [Laughter.] But we will settle it in our own time. In the mean while I want this Democratic House to pass a measure that shall abolish a system against which every father of the party from Thomas Jefferson down has inveighed. I want that we shall rid the wheat fields of Iowa, rid the orchards and vineyards of my own State, rid the tobacco fields of Virginia and North Carolina, rid the manufacturing people who are engaged in the tobacco industry, rid our free people everywhere of a system that creates spies and informers and loads down honest trade and toil. I want that we shall pass a true Democratic measure by ceasing to deal with the unclean thing in piecemeal, a species of legislative quackery that addresses itself to alleviating a local affection instead of boldly eradicating the disease that produced it.

From the standpoint of sound policy this bill is a bad one; from a business point of view these men are the victims of their own folly or cupidity; from a legislative view it is forgiving a debt honestly and legally due the Government and voting away about $60,000,000 of the people's money or at least imperiling its collection. Sound statesmanship and the good sense and honesty of the American people declare against this bill.

Mr. STORM. Mr. Chairman, I stand pledged to the repeal of the whole internal-revenue system.

This system had its origin in the dire necessities of a great civil war, in which the nation was struggling for its very life and existence. When the measure was introduced into this House it was denounced by Democrats as undemocratic, anti-republican, inquisitorial, oppressive, and unjust; on the other side of this Chamber its defense was based solely upon the ground of a necessity created by the exigencies of war; and now, Mr. Chairman, after a lapse of more than twenty years, and more than eighteen years since the close of the war, this system stands a disgrace to our age, and a large number of gentlemen, who twenty years ago were as vehement in their denunciation of internal taxation as I am now, have for some reason become satisfied with it, and are now opposed to its repeal.

This system has been regarded with disfavor by every Democratic administration from the beginning of the century. The first law on the subject was enacted during the administration of Washington. It was so detested by the people that the "whisky rebellion" was the result of the popular indignation against it. This law remained in force till 1801. Mr. Jefferson, in his first message to Congress, advocated its repeal, and Congress promptly repealed the obnoxious law. During the second war with England the nation a second time was obliged to resort to this extraordinary method of taxation. It lasted but four years. The first act of Mr. Monroe on coming into power was to recommend its repeal. Mr. Jefferson regretted that the Constitution ever admitted this species of taxation. In his letter to Mr. Monroe he says:

> The excise system is an infernal one. The first error was to admit it by the Constitution; the second, to act on that admission. The information of our militia returned from the westward is uniform that, though the people there let them pass quietly, they were the objects of laughter, not of fear; that their detestation of the excise law is universal, and is now associated with a detestation of the Government.—Jefferson's Letter to Monroe.

It appears from this that my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] was not the first to denounce the system as an infernal one.

In his message recommending the repeal of the excise duties imposed under Mr. Madison's administration Mr. Monroe said:

> To impose taxes upon the people when the public exigencies require them is an obligation of the most sacred character, especially with a free people. * * * To dispense with taxes, when it may be done with perfect safety, is equally the duty of their representatives.—Monroe's Message.

Blackstone in his Commentaries takes occasion to speak in this wise concerning excise:

> The rigor and arbitrary proceedings of the excise seem hardly compatible with the spirit of a free nation. * * * Such was the opinion of their general unpopularity, that when, in 1642, aspersions were cast by malignant persons upon the house of commons that they intended to introduce excises, the house for its vindication therein did declare that these rumors were false and scandalous, and that their authors should be apprehended and brought to condign punishment.

Mr. BUCKNER. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him as to historic fact, I will say that the act of 1812, as he will find, was nothing but an act of licenses—special taxes. The law of 1792 was never enforced except under provisions similar to the present internal-revenue system.

Mr. STORM. I so understand. I contend that the system was the same. I am opposing not any particular method, but the whole system of taxation by excises, whether imposed upon the manufactured article or by a system of licenses.

From Madison's last administration down till after the breaking out of the late civil war we hear no more of internal taxes. While the act has been changed and many portions repealed, yet its worst features remain, and must remain, until it is totally expunged from the statute-book.

It is literally and truly a statute of pains and penalties. Nearly every clause creates a crime, and nearly every paragraph contains a penalty, and every section is made horrid by the distrust it throws upon human nature. Every humane presumption or maxim with which our common and statute law invest a human being is by this infernal system reversed or annulled. It starts out on the theory that man is naturally a thief and a robber, who needs to be watched by spies and kept from stealing by gauges, meters, locks, and other contrivances. It interferes with the use and disposition he might desire to make of the kindly fruits of the earth.

The law bristles all over with monstrosities and hideous deformities, and ought to be instantly repealed. There is no excuse for its retention a single day longer so far as this House is concerned. The income of the national Treasury is so largely in excess of the demands upon it that we are puzzled with the question, What shall we do with the surplus? The tariff bill reported to this House by the Committee on Ways and Means proposes to reduce taxation. Yet one of the ablest of that committee, a gentleman who ranks high in this country as a political economist [Mr. HEWITT], very frankly expressed his fears yesterday that the proposed measure would not reduce revenue—would not have the effect its authors intended.

It was estimated that the reductions recommended by the Tariff Commission would amount to 20 or 25 per cent., yet in fact it did not amount to 10 per cent. And, Mr. Chairman, I here affirm that the bill, being framed on the theory of a tariff for revenue, will not decrease the customs receipts, but will increase them.

Here, then, we should all make our stand in favor of reducing revenues, for in repealing internal taxes we know just what amount we are letting go.

Mr. MORRISON. The gentleman from New York said it might not have the effect of reducing revenue; I did not understand him to say that it would not reduce taxation.

Mr. STORM. If it does not reduce revenue it does not remove the difficulty I am arguing against. I am contending that you do not touch the surplus in the Treasury; and I am satisfied that the present committee has made the same mistake that the Tariff Commission made when they declared that by their proposed legislation they would make a reduction of from 20 to 25 per cent., while, as the Committee on Ways and Means, of which my friend [Mr. MORRISON] is the illustrious chairman, have shown in their report, the reduction would not reach 2 per cent. on the value of the importation.

What a spectacle do we behold here to-day! The whisky distillers and speculators clamoring to have the time in which they are required by existing law to pay the tax on the distilled products now in the bonded warehouses extended for two years more, making five in all. Yet these distillers and speculators in whisky and their friends on this floor have not made a single effort to secure the repeal of this law. Is this whisky power so weak that it can not be heard? It is powerful enough to send a man to the United States Senate in the place of one who had the temerity to dispute its arrogance and audacity and to inquire into its methods. It makes no secret of its power to send men into this Hall such as it likes and to defeat those who have displeased it. Why has not this more than autocratic power and influence been exerted in behalf of the repeal of this law? The answer is on the surface; it requires no great mental effort to discover it; it is this: The present law, odious as it is, is agreeable to the distiller and whisky speculator because it makes the distillation of spirits a monopoly. It shuts out the small distiller. The farmer who before the war could convert his grain and corn into whisky and his fruits into brandy and wine can not do so now. He can not afford to pay for the machinery and espionage required under the existing law to run a small distillery.

Few honest and prudent men acquainted with the stringent provisions of the present law and the risk they must take arising from mistakes or the carelessness of clerks and employés, will embark in the business.

The bill before us, Mr. Chairman, will not afford the relief supposed. It is but a contrivance, a clumsy shift, by which the evil is postponed, not removed.

What was the effect of the act of 1878, by which the bonded period was made three years? In 1878, on the 30th day of June, the quantity of spirits remaining in the distillery warehouses was 14,088,773 gallons; but in 1879, under the stimulus of the act of 1878, the production was increased to 19,212,470 gallons, or more than 5,000,000 gallons in one year. In the year 1880, however, the increase was still more remarkable, reaching 31,363,869 gallons.

A similar result was produced by the act of 1880, known as the Carlisle bill. It repealed the interest clause of 5 per cent. and reduced the penalty in the bond one-half, making the penalty equal to the amount of the tax, instead of double, as had been the case before. The next fiscal year shows an astounding result. The production leaped instantly from 31,363,869 gallons in 1880 to 64,648,111 gallons in 1881, or more than 33,000,000 of gallons in one year. In 1882 it reached 89,962,645 gallons, and in 1883 80,499,993 gallons.

I append the following table, taken from the last annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury:

> The following table shows the quantity remaining in distillery warehouses at the close of each of the fifteen fiscal years during which spirits have been stored in such warehouses:

| | Gallons. |
|---|---|
| Quantity remaining June 30, 1869 | 16,685,166 |
| Quantity remaining June 30, 1870 | 11,671,886 |
| Quantity remaining June 30, 1871 | 6,744,360 |
| Quantity remaining June 30, 1872 | 10,103,392 |
| Quantity remaining June 30, 1873 | 14,650,148 |
| Quantity remaining June 30, 1874 | 15,575,224 |
| Quantity remaining June 30, 1875 | 13,179,596 |
| Quantity remaining June 30, 1876 | 12,595,850 |
| Quantity remaining June 30, 1877 | 13,091,773 |
| Quantity remaining June 30, 1878 | 14,088,773 |
| Quantity remaining June 30, 1879 | 19,212,470 |
| Quantity remaining June 30, 1880 | 31,363,869 |
| Quantity remaining June 30, 1881 | 64,648,111 |
| Quantity remaining June 30, 1882 | 89,962,645 |
| Quantity remaining June 30, 1883 | 80,499,993 |

What folly to talk about giving relief to this branch of business by postponing the time of payment of these taxes! We might as well talk about pouring oil on the flame to extinguish the fire as to talk about relief from overproduction by stimulating it.

The bill of 1880 was framed by the distillers themselves, as one of their managers swore before a committee which investigated the charge that money had been corruptly used to secure its passage. He swore the bill was passed by Congress just as it was drawn, without the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i."

It is not strange that the distillers and speculators in bonded whisky want the present law continued and the time for the payment of taxes extended. Uncle Sam makes a very desirable partner for these gentlemen. They have invested in the enterprise about 30 cents to Uncle Sam's 90 cents. They say to him, "Give us two years' time in which to pay up our share of the capital stock, and we will pay you 8 cents and 1 mill for the favor." In the mean time Uncle Sam must be at the expense of watching his partners in order they may not steal the partnership effects, must submit to the entire loss of leakage, which the law makes equal to about 16 per cent.—a sum larger than the whole interest paid to him—and must also take the risk of loss by fire or from any other cause.

But here the partnership ends. At the end of the five years the partnership assets, by aging, have advanced to $2.50 per gallon, but Uncle Sam finds that he was not a partner, but only a lender; he gets back his 90 cents plus his 8 cents and 1 mill interest, less the deductions and risks mentioned, and the distiller pockets the $1.20 on each gallon. From such a partnership the Government ought to retire at the very earliest day possible.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] votes for this bill because he thinks it will lead to its repeal. How such a result will follow he did not inform us. I can imagine only one reason why it should have such an effect, and that is the passage of this bill would be such a glaring outrage that the people would rise in rebellion against it and demand its repeal.

Mr. Chairman, I shall vote against the bill for the very opposite reason given by the gentleman from New York. I believe the extension of the period for paying the taxes on whisky is an extension of the time of repeal, and only postpones that much-desired day. Let us refuse this extension, and compel this powerful monopoly to come in and join us in an effort to get the law repealed.

I have not attempted to argue this question from a moral standpoint. I do not think the temperance question is in any way involved in the bill. I think the temperance people would regard the passage of the bill as a concession and a favor to a class of people not entitled to them; in which opinion many others will concur. I do not share the moral indifference of the gentleman from New York. It would make with me a great deal of difference whether the subject-matter to be taxed was a ton of pig-iron or a ton of whisky. All writers on political economy make the distinction by dividing articles of consumption into two classes, profitable and unprofitable; and in the latter class they all include spirituous liquors and tobacco. They all claim that in the imposition of taxes the latter class should bear the burden, to the end that their use might be discouraged.

The uniform tendency of all legislation in this country is in that direction. It regards the traffic in alcoholic beverages as a dangerous one. Its unlimited sale is allowed in no State of the Union that I have information concerning. Some prohibit entirely; others place its sale under strict regulations. It is taxed more heavily than any other class of products manufactured for consumption, not on the ground that it is a luxury, but because its influence on the morals of the community is baleful and its pernicious effects should be confined to the smallest possible limits.

Therefore in freeing spirits from the tax imposed by the Federal Government I do not advocate exempting them from the heaviest burden the States may see proper to impose. The General Government under its limited powers can not touch the moral aspects of the question. The States have full and ample power to deal with the question in all its economical and moral aspects.

Instead of continuing the collection of this tax and redistributing it again among the States, as advocated by some crack-brained statesmen, I am in favor of repealing the tax, and handing the subject of taxing whisky over to the States to deal with as they may deem best.

Mr. Chairman, I say extirpate the system at once. Do away with an army of 4,000 collectors, agents, spies, &c. Save the $5,000,000 which it now costs to collect internal taxes. Let us collect all our revenues from customs duties in the old-fashioned Democratic way. The two systems are not needed. One is sufficient for the needs of the Government. No one asks to discontinue the customs system, and we are all agreed on the other, that it ought to be wiped out.

On the first call of States for bills at the present session, Mr. Chairman, I offered a bill providing for the repeal of all internal taxes. The Committee of Ways and Means, so far as we are informed, have not acted on it. That bill I shall offer as an amendment to the bill now pending, if an opportunity for amendment is afforded me.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I trust, Mr. Chairman, that in what I have to say upon the pending measure I shall not make myself amenable to criticism in speaking from the standpoint of a constituency that holds any personal concern or special interest in the fate of the measure. I promise in advance that I will not copy questionable examples which have been set me by indulging in any appeal either to prejudice or to sympathy. I am not master of rhetoric; but if I were, I would discard it here and ask this committee to consider this bill simply from the standpoint of lawmakers grappling with a business question affecting seriously the revenues of this country.

To those who know me, Mr. Chairman, by long service in this House I hope that it is not necessary for me to disclaim any wish or purpose to ever fail in my desire to extend every civil courtesy and polite recognition to my fellow-members in debate; but as this question has been discussed so elaborately, as every opportunity for interruption and question has been given for weeks during the discussion of this question, I ask as a measure of friendly courtesy upon the part of the committee that I may be allowed to finish what I have to say without request for interruption or question. And I will promise, in consideration of the extension of that courtesy, to exert myself to the utmost to make the fairest statement of facts and the most candid presentation of the case of which I am capable. I will distort no figures, I will not strain any data, but from the standpoint of a man who is possessed of decided convictions upon the subject I will make the presentation of my views as fair as possible.

This, Mr. Chairman, is a business proposition. It admits of no sentiment of sympathy. It is not fair to invoke prejudice against it and it is not manly to invoke sympathy in its behalf. If, however, when viewed from the fairest standpoint to which it may be subjected, it does not commend itself to the best judgment of this House, it should not pass and would not receive my support. But, Mr. Chairman, I can not candidly confess that it has been altogether fairly dealt with by those who have seen proper to oppose it. More than one gentleman who has been heard in opposition has taken occasion in violation not only of the rules of parliamentary discussion, but in open and flagrant violation of the rules adopted by this House for its government, to seek to invade the sacred precincts of the committee-room and give to this committee their own crude ideas, couched in suspicious terms, as to how this bill ever came before the House. Pictures have been drawn of minorities of that committee packing it in here in their arms in the face of the protests of majorities. If the gentleman from Arkansas was as familiar as his service here for years ought to have made him both with regard to the rules of parliamentary bodies generally and the rules of this House, he would not need to have been reminded, and there appear to be others in the same situation, that it is not competent for a member of this House, not even a member of the committee, to go into the transactions of that committee-room or discuss in the House the action taken by any of its membership.

Mr. DUNN. I will give the gentleman an explanation that will be satisfactory to himself, if he will permit me.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I must follow his example of yesterday, and adhere to my request and declination to be interrupted.

Mr. DUNN. Certainly. But the gentleman ought not to assign false meanings to members and then raise the shield of the rules of this House for his own protection. He ought not to shoot from behind that fortification at others.

Mr. BLACKBURN. But I must go on. That is not all I have a right to say. I have a right to say that the record shows, both of that committee and this House, that this bill came here and came fairly. The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, if anybody, is the one upon whom criticism would fall. He reported this bill to the House and said that the Committee on Ways and Means had instructed him to do so. He said that there would be no minority report filed, but said at the same time that it was not the unanimous report of the committee. When he made that report to this House he obeyed to the letter the instructions that his committee had given him. He did nothing more. He did nothing else than voice the sentiment of that committee, as couched in that order with which he stood charged; and if this be not a correct and an absolutely correct statement of the facts, then I appeal to any and every Republican member of the Committee on Ways and Means whether he can bear me out or not.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I desire to say that the gentleman from Kentucky states exactly the facts as they occurred. The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means was authorized to report the bill and to state, as he did, that it was not a unanimous report. It is due to him, to the gentleman from Kentucky, and to the committee to make this statement.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I thank my colleague on the committee for his statement.

Mr. BRUMM. May I ask a question in this connection?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I must decline to be interrupted. I have said enough to show how this bill came before the House and that it is properly before it. The record has been given; the facts have been stated, and I trust that no member upon this floor will allow his mind to be poisoned or prejudiced by reason of these unwarranted flings that an unwarranted suspicion has prompted.

But, sir, I wish to go to the discussion of this measure. The question submitted to us is whether the Government ought in common fairness and justice to pass the bill, to grant this relief. If the Government was to be injured in its resources by reason of its passage, I would not ask it. If it was to release or relinquish a single hold which the Government has to-day to secure the payment of this revenue, then I would not ask the passage of the measure. But if the Government is not to be and can not be the loser to the extent of a single penny, if the Government does not release a single hold that it has to-day to enforce the collection of the tax, if the financial condition of the Government is such that it does not need the money, then I submit to business men, to practical lawmakers, what objection can reasonably be urged against granting the appeal of these people?

We are met on the one hand by gentlemen opposing this bill who tell us if it is passed it fastens permanently on this country an internal-revenue system of taxation which they are anxious to destroy and obliterate. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT], my colleague on the committee, made that assertion here upon yesterday. I doubt not, in fact I am assured, that he was giving utterance to his most honest convictions. I am equally sure that he spoke for himself alone, and that no other man that stands here to-day in support of this measure holds views similar to that. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], who sit here before me, and others too have declared to you that they are opposed to this bill, and yet they are admitted, avowed, and open advocates for the maintenance of the internal-revenue system of taxation. But then comes the gentleman from the State of Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], and the one from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO], and the gentleman from Pennsylvania who sits immediately before me when in his seat [Mr. STORM], and they tell you that they oppose this bill because they are in favor of abolishing internal-revenue taxation, and that if you do not kill this bill you will never abolish that system of taxation.

How are these gentlemen to reconcile their differences? They seem to be trying to reach a common goal; they seem to be working for a common purpose; which is the murder of this measure. But they do not agree as to the reasons that impel them, but on the contrary are bumping their heads together with irreconcilable logic, if logic at all it be.

Why, Mr. Chairman, I have been amazed to listen to declarations such as came the other day from the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG], whom I see before me. He tells this Congress and the country that the object and the purpose of these people is to get relief from the payment of this tax altogether. And that has been the burden of the song of the opposition from the beginning until now—that this is only an entering-wedge toward the relief from taxation altogether upon bonded spirits. The gentleman says that if you grant this request, the opposition generally say that if you grant this request, the next demand made upon you will be to repeal the whisky tax, and having extended the period of sale for two years they will within that period secure the repeal of the internal-revenue system and go scot-free, and there will be no taxes paid at all. Is there logic or reason or sense or fairness in such specious appeals as that? How can it happen? Is there not a surplus of manufactured goods in this country to-day? Is there a man of the opposition who dares to deny that the ground of his opposition rests upon the charge that there has been overproduction and that to-day there is a surplus here sufficient to meet the wants of two or it may be three years to come? Taking that as a postulate, let us see how easy it is and how short a road demonstrates the balderdash with which those gentlemen would feed this House.

Overproduction, a glut in the market, surplus goods which consumption can not take up for two or three years, and yet a repeal of the whisky tax within two years, they say, would cheat and rob the Government of all this tax. How so? Suppose you enforce the collection of this tax to-day, each day as it falls due. Suppose you kill this bill and demand the tax and get it; what happens? One of two things must occur. Either this whisky must be shipped abroad, exported, in which case under the law as it stands the Government gets no tax, or the man who at present holds it must pay the tax and continue to hold it, or the purchaser at these confiscation sales, buying it even at sacrificial prices, will continue to hold it until this surplus is demanded by consumption, which you tell us can not be within two years. Then, if the tax be repealed, the holder of the unbroken packages under the law comes back to your Federal Treasury and demands and gets his rebate to the last penny that he has ever paid in the nature of a tax. It is preposterous. Under no state of case can a repeal of the internal-revenue system of taxation rob the Treasury of this tax in the event of passing the bill any more than it would be deprived of it if the bill were defeated and the tax was paid. If these goods go abroad they pay no tax. If they pay tax in advance and are subsequently shipped abroad the Government must refund every dollar. If the present holder pays the tax and continues to hold the goods, he goes to your Treasury and gets back every dollar of the money that you have extorted in the nature of tax. If they are sold for 50 cents a gallon, the man who buys and holds in unbroken packages will come to your Treasury Department and claim and receive every dollar of the tax.

But, again, I ask you to tell me who is it that is going to repeal this tax? You say you are afraid to pass this bill lest the tax on whisky may be repealed. The whisky-holder can not repeal it. The man who has money in it has no power to make or repeal a statute. Who has that power that you are afraid of? The Government of the United States—yourselves. That tax will never be remitted to these people; the Government will never fail to receive it. It will never be repealed, except that you yourselves, the men who sit here to frame laws for the Government of this people, shall so decree it. And if you do within the next two years, these people will get their money back whether you pass this bill or not. There is no foundation for such a flimsy appeal to rest upon and claim the dignity of an argument.

But this has been said to be a peculiar tax. So it is. This article, it is charged, stands isolated and alone as the victim of harsh and rigorous legislation. That is true; the record shows it. You know full well, for it has been often repeated here upon this floor, and stands at this moment without any one reckless enough to contradict or impeach it, that this bonded period was never fixed on this industry until the unblushing frauds perpetrated upon the Federal Treasury made it necessary to adopt legislation in the nature of penal statutes in order to secure their suppression. From that day until now the policy of Congress has been liberalizing in its tendency. From that day till now Congress has been busily engaged in striking down these rigorous exactions.

At that time, when the one-year bonded period was established, the distiller was required to give a bond, and to renew it every ten days, conditioned in double the amount of the value of the tax on the whisky in the warehouse. That law was modified, that bond was extended to thirty days instead of ten, and the amount of the penal sum of the bond was divided in half, and the rigor of the law was abated.

The severe exactions to which this branch of industry has been forced to submit have been ameliorated time and time again. When the purpose of that penal statute had been accomplished, when the frauds had been suppressed, in 1878 Congress without serious opposition passed a joint resolution extending the bonded period from one year to three years. It has gone on that plane from then till now.

For nearly fourteen years, and I speak in the light of the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, there has never been a fraud perpetrated upon your revenues in this quarter, nor even one attempted. In all that long period there has not been a suit instituted upon these bonds nor a demand made of payment upon one of their sureties.

If it be admitted, and it has never been denied by any gentleman, that these severe and rigorous provisions of the law were imposed simply and solely for the purpose of suppressing fraud and protecting the Treasury, then in the light of fourteen years' experience, during which you cannot cite me to a single instance of a violation of the law nor the institution of a single suit upon the penal bond, I ask you, gentlemen, as men of common sense and common fairness, what need is there to continue any longer any portion of your penal provisions?

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue is satisfied; his letter is here before you, and it is your fault if you have not acquainted yourselves with it. He tells you that this bill is an honest one; he tells you that it is a fair one; he tells you that the Government will lose nothing by reason of its passage. He recommends its consideration to you, and he guarantees that the hold which the Government has for its tax will not be impeached or weakened by the passage of this bill. I can not for the life of me see how, except at the dictate of prejudice or fanaticism, this proposition can be rejected by national minds.

I do not think it is altogether clear that Congress has the power, or ever had the power, to levy this tax after the fashion that it was imposed. When you come to consider three provisions of the Federal Constitution, the one declaring the powers that are vested in the Federal Congress, "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States;" and when you come to consider another clause of that instrument, which declares that "no capitation or other direct tax shall be laid unless in proportion to the census or enumeration hereinbefore directed to be taken;" and when you crown those two with the third, which provides that "no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State," I submit the question to any lawyer as to whether the power of Congress is established and its road is a clear one for the levying and the laying of a tax like this.

The law of Congress under which you levy this tax to-day shows clearly that it was intended by its framers to be founded upon the assumption of constitutional power to tax upon the measure of consumption, not of production. It is not clear that Congress has power to tax any commodity in this country except upon the measure of consumption. Else why was your law drawn as it is? Why demand of the whisky-holders tax upon what is consumed here, while you dare not require him to pay tax upon what he sends abroad? It is consumption and not production that may be fairly taxed by Congressional power, unless you mean to give a doubtful construction to the provisions of the organic law to which I have called your attention.

They tell us that this is a loan; that the Government is asked to become a partner with the whisky dealer or the whisky holder. That is not true. My friend from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] met that proposition with an answer so plain that it seems to me that it will scarce bear repetition.

But they say if this is not a loan, then why require the whisky holder to pay 4½ per cent. interest per annum to the Federal Government? I will answer and tell you why. The whisky holder has the power and the right to-day, under existing law, to export every gallon of his goods and send it for storage in foreign ports. Mathematical calculation of the cost of export will show you that it ranges from six to ten dollars per barrel, owing to the distance from the seaboard over which it must pay expense of transportation by rail. And a mathematical calculation will show you that 4½ per cent. interest running for a period of two years will amount to within an infinitesimal fraction of the same sum that it would cost the holder to transport his goods abroad.

Then coming down to it as a naked business proposition, the question is simply this: Will this Government force the holder of whisky to export his goods, or will it agree to let him hold them two years longer and pay into the coffers of the Treasury, instead of to foreign warehousemen and the skippers upon the high seas for transportation, an equal amount in order to secure the same protection?

But gentlemen say that the goods will not be exported; and the next individual who opposes the passage of the bill assures us that they will all be exported, and some gentlemen are anxious to have this done. Suppose you force exportation upon these people; let me ask these self-constituted guardians of the weak and the poor, who will become the beneficiary of that process of export? Will it not be the holder, who is a capitalist, provided with sufficient means to meet the expenses of this exportation? Will it be the little man who scarce has capital enough to operate his distillery or credit enough in bank to carry on his legitimate vocation? You know that the holder of whisky who is backed by banking capital and limitless credit will send his whiskies abroad, while the poorer and smaller holder will become the victim of an enforced sale or extorted taxation. Is there fairness or logic in that proposition?

But let me ask you further, why do you want to send this whisky abroad? What good comes to the Federal Government? What advantage has the Federal Treasury? No tax will be paid unless it be reimported. If it is exported, it will never be brought back until the period of extension has expired or that threatened calamity to which we are doomed, as some tell us—the repeal of the whisky tax—shall come. For one, Mr. Chairman, I am no advocate of the abolition of the internal-revenue system. I was not one of the original advocates of its adoption. There never was an anathema or a curse pronounced upon it too deep or bitter for me to repeat. But it is here, and it is with me a choice between evils as to whether I would repeal that system or vote to correct and revise that which is worse—an unjust and burdensome tariff.

I am not an advocate of free whisky. I am not an advocate of that policy which would defeat this measure and glut the American market with cheapened goods purchased at confiscation sales, flooding every hamlet and village of the land, in order that the country may be treated to whisky at 5 cents a drink and salt and sugar at half a dollar a pound. I do not believe in a theory like that. I do not intend to become a party to such a practice.

But my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] who preceded me tells us that the course of whisky legislation from the inception of this industry till now has been in the direction of monopoly. He opposes it because it is a monopoly. I do humbly and sincerely thank God that with the aid of a search-warrant we have at last been allowed to discover one monopoly upon this continent of which he is not the champion. I am delighted to find that there is such a thing as securing his opposition to monopoly domination in this land. But probably it is to be explained upon the ground that the monopoly to which he now objects is not located in his section, and he wants a monopoly of monopoly.

Monopoly, indeed! If you reject this bill you leave to the capitalists engaged in this trade the only measure of protection that any may have, which is to be found in seeking under foreign governments that friendly aid which the home Government denies to one of its legitimate and legalized industries.

What objection is there to the business in which these men are employed? Are we to treat this question as we would a code of ethics or a system of morals submitted to a church meeting of elders? We are not here as school-teachers nor as conductors of young men's Christian associations; nor do we constitute an army of salvation. We are here, or presumed to be here, to deal as practical men should deal with business questions. Your Government is the party involved.

But my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] asks, "If the security that you offer to the Government is as good as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue says, if the rate of interest you offer to pay is as high as that which the Government pays upon any of its outstanding indebtedness, why do you not go to the banks that are plethoric with money and get your relief from them?" Now, Mr. Chairman, is it fair to ask any gentleman to pause or waste time in responding to a question like that? Is it not answered the moment it is submitted? Do you expect a banker—a national banker or a private banker—to write himself down such an ineffable ass as to advance 90 cents per gallon on this whisky, to say nothing of its original cost as a product, when here stand these gentlemen on both sides of this Chamber, Republicans and Democrats, with locked shields, swearing and vowing that they never mean to stop or rest until they repeal this tax altogether?

Mr. LONG. And pay back a rebate.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Provided the bank will guarantee that the man will hold it in unbroken package. Is the banker expected to become an insurer not only as to the amount of money that he counts out over his counter, but upon the integrity, the honesty, and the fair dealing of each and every one of his customers? Is it right for them to remit him to the bankers, when at the very same time, in the very same breath, they serve notice upon the bankers that "if you do this, you do it at your peril; if you do it, you do it with the knowledge and the understanding that we mean to repeal the tax and leave you without your security?" Mr. Chairman, it is preposterous; and yet it is all of a piece with every argument offered in opposition to this bill. I see no ground upon which they may stand in their opposition. But 4½ interest is offered. That amounts when you come to figure it out in plain terms to an increase of the tax of 3¾ cents upon each gallon of whisky. Instead of decreasing, therefore, it is a positive increase of the tax.

Again, sir, this money is not in the coffers of the Treasury. You can not put it there except you do it with the consent of the holders or else by an absolute method of confiscation. The gentleman from Arkansas declared on yesterday that if this bill should pass there would be a gap of two years' revenue from this source of taxation——

Mr. DUNN. On all covered by this bill.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I say that that is not a fair statement of the case; it is not a true statement of the case. Experience refutes it. The record of the country and its history deny it. It does not matter to you one whit whether of these 80,000,000 gallons a year used in this country 65,000,000 gallons of it be high wines and rectified and blended goods and 15,000,000 gallons be of the higher grade or straight whiskies, or whether the whole 80,000,000 gallons shall be of the one or other grade. The tax is the same on all. The high-grade whiskies are the only ones that are affected by this bill. The high wines, the rectified and blended goods never seek that advantage, for they do not improve or increase in value with age.

If you pass this bill the effect is to withhold or to withdraw from immediate market the 15,000,000 gallons, and their place is then to be filled by an equal amount of the high-wines added to the former consumption; and the record of the Treasury Department demonstrates that to be true. This will show that the result will be an increase of the revenues of the Government. The Government will receive year by year in round numbers what it received before and what it will receive to-day by the enforcement of this tax if you insist upon it. It will be doing this and nothing more. It will be giving to an industry which is now taxed to the utmost tension, and which is the recipient from the Government of vexation, trial, and trouble, an opportunity to conform to that universal and inexorable law that rules and dominates over all of the people, the law of supply and demand regulating each other. That is all.

But we are told, Mr. Chairman, that these gentlemen are guilty, because, forsooth, with their eyes wide open they went forward in this maelstrom of overproduction. Granted. Is that a sin? Is it a crime that they should have done so? Does it convert them into criminals? Does it bring them to the bar of justice, to the bar of the court, and require the persons who did it to answer the specifications and counts of a criminal indictment? Are they the only ones that overproduced? It is not that, Mr. Chairman. It is because these gentlemen in their position can not be fair. Why did they tell the House what was not true when they said that overproduction followed immediately upon the extension of the bonded period from one to three years in 1878, and that it was attributable to that, and that alone? I claim, sir, that the record of the country shows this to be false. Overproduction never began for two and a half years after the extension of the bonded period. That bonded period was based upon a joint resolution introduced by myself in 1878—the 27th day of March, in the early part—and this day is the anniversary of it. I wish to state further that the overproduction never began, as shown by this report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, until the fall of 1880.

Mr. HERBERT. Will the gentleman permit me——

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am speaking now by the record. I hold the report of the Commissioner in my hand.

Mr. HERBERT. The increase began before that.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am speaking now of overproduction. I say that did not begin until the fall of 1880. I did not say that the increase did not begin. It is a different question, and I repeat that I hold the statement in my hand, the tabulated statement from the Treasury Department in support of the assertion. No man can deny it, for if he does he contents himself with a reckless assault upon the official figures of the Treasury Department of this Government.

But more, sir. They tell us with that candid fairness for which the other side of this debate has been made phenomenal that the extension was the only thing that stimulated and promoted this overproduction. Was there an industry of this whole broad country that was not abnormally stimulated by reason of the prosperity that began to return in 1879? Take the manufactures of iron, the production of iron, of woolen goods, cotton textiles, and every industry, and the records will show that each was stimulated to an unnatural and an abnormal degree by the prosperous times that dawned in 1879. Did not the prophets have their prophecies fulfilled and more than fulfilled by the most prosperous era that had dawned upon the country for twenty years?

Admit that these men did overproduce, as everybody else overproduces; what then? Why, they answer and say the iron-man and the woolen-man and the cotton-man did not come to Congress and ask for a stay-law. Is there an answer needed to so specious a plea as that? Neither the iron nor the woolen nor the cotton nor any other industry or occupation in this country was the victim of taxation. There was and there is no tax upon any of these industries. This is the only one. They all are the beneficiaries of taxes imposed upon everybody else for their especial benefit.

A MEMBER. And tobacco?

Mr. BLACKBURN. And tobacco. This is the only one, and it does not come to ask to be relieved from any of the legitimate consequences of its own overproduction. It does not even ask you to abate one jot or tittle of your tax exactions, it does not ask you to weaken the grasp by which you hold them to its payment; it simply asks you to give time upon business principles of fair remuneration to the Federal Government, with bonds and sureties exacted to its satisfaction, to enable them to put themselves upon terms of equality with these other industries.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, rose.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I beg my colleague to excuse me. I have refused too often. I am sure he has had his full share in the way of interruptions during this debate.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] in the exercise of a liberality for which the tobacco and the beer men will doubtless forever be profoundly grateful, told us the other day in that excellent and admirable and plausible but still specious speech of his that he was perfectly willing to give an unlimited bonded period to tobacco and to beer; but at the same time he told you his reason for that generosity, that it was because they did not want it, did not need it, and could not use it. But to this the only product of American industry that did want it, that did need it, one that could use it, he would not give one minute's time. The prodigal generosity of that gentleman is equal to that of the famous individual who was perfectly willing to immolate upon the altar of his patriotism the last one of his wife's relations. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Massachusetts tells you that tobacco and beer can not stand aging; that age deteriorates instead of improving them. This is the only commodity that needs it or demands it. And they come here to ask of the Federal Government no mercy. They come to plead for no sympathy. They come to make no demands, to exact no remedies. They come to submit fairly their case, to state their necessities, to offer their proposition to the satisfaction of this Government's officials, to ask for terms of equity in which they may be dealt with.

But, Mr. Chairman, what is still more, we are told that if this bill be granted demands will come to Congress again for further relief or similar extensions. For one, sir, I am perfectly willing to admit that this bill does not meet my views as to what is the correct principle of the levying and laying of taxes. I do not believe that there should be any period of limitation fixed at all. I believe that the law should stand as it originally stood, as it would have stood to this day and this hour had it not been for the frauds that were perpetrated upon the revenues of the country demanding, as I have said, the enactment of penal statutes. I do not believe in the constitutional power of this Congress to tax any commodity except upon the measure of consumption. I do not believe that you have the right to lay an excise tax or a direct tax, except as the Constitution provides. The courts have held that there was no such thing as a direct tax unless it be laid on real estate according to its ascertained value or what is known as a capitation tax. I do not believe in that policy as a sound one which would result in enforced sales and the Government standing by as the claimant of confiscated property, and that before an opportunity for a market had ever been offered or afforded to an honest manufacturer.

But, Mr. Chairman, if this even shall be true, I ask members of this committee not to answer and tell me, but to answer in the chambers of their own consciences and say whether there is a single square inch of defensible ground, of sound argument, of honest logic upon which they may pitch an opposing vote to the passage of this measure?

I want in this connection to say it has been intimated that there would be an amendment offered probably by the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] or by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] looking still further in the direction of securing the interest upon this tax to the Government beyond all peradventure. That amendment will doubtless be to require the payment of this 4½ per cent. tax either semi-annually or quarterly in advance. I say here, sir, that for myself I shall promptly accept and cordially support either the one or the other. I do not want this Government to lose a penny. Here in the presence of this Congress and in the presence of the country I do declare that it is not my purpose by direction or indirection, by vote or by voice, to secure or aid in the securement of the passage of any bill that shall repeal an atom of this tax or strip the Treasury of a single penny that is to become due to it under existing law. I want it retained. I want it kept there as long as the necessities of the Government require revenue to be raised to pension its soldiers, to pay its debts, and maintain its existence.

I do not know, Mr. Chairman, that it has been within the compass of my poor power to utter a word that is calculated to sway the judgment or influence the vote of a single member here. I have spoken probably with earnestness, for I feel the interests that hang upon the passage of this bill. I do know this: You may forget if you choose the history of this great industry. Its representatives have come to this Congress stating an honest case, asking upon fair and liberal and honest business principles to get relief.

You may drive them from your doors empty-handed, if you choose; but, I thank God, they will go as they came, clean-handed, the sneering suspicions of gentlemen of the opposition to the contrary notwithstanding. No man has dared to stand upon this floor and charge that corrupt means have been resorted to or questionable methods been employed in the aid or the advocacy of this measure. Those for whose benefit it is asked are trembling to-day upon the verge of bankruptcy; they have no money for corrupt purposes. Trusting in the justice of their cause and in the equity of the claim they submit, trusting still further to the integrity and honesty and devotion of their friends who are entitled to be heard for them, they have submitted their case with confidence to your decision.

You may forget, if you please, that in the dark hour of your country's trial, in the day of its calamity, when this great Government in its structure was shaken to its foundation-stone amid the throes of revolution, you brought this industry into existence as a taxable quantity and harnessed it for your own service. You may prove oblivious to the aid it has given and the service it has rendered, to the debts it has paid and the contribution which it is still to-day paying. All this may pass from your memory; but still you are confronted by the obligation you have assumed to deal with this question beyond the realm of prejudice or maudlin sentimentality, to deal with it as a business proposition, and to deal with it as honestly and fairly as it deserves.

I know that a change has come over the spirit of the dreams of many gentlemen here. I know that the gentleman from Pennsylvania on the other side [Mr. KELLEY], and his equally distinguished colleague [Mr. RANDALL], and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT], and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], aye, and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN], in the last Congress were not the opponents of a bill like this.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman misstates the matter as to myself, of course unintentionally.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Did the gentleman from Georgia vote against this bill in the last Congress?

Mr. BLOUNT. The "gentleman from Georgia" time and time again voted against considering the bill.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Did the gentleman vote against the unlimited extension bill in the last Congress?

Mr. DUNN. I did. I have always steadily voted against any and all legislation to extend the bonded period.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have not examined the record.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have, and that is the difference. I repeat, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] was not opposed to this bill in the last Congress.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have no objection to the embarrassment the gentleman proposes to myself.

Mr. BLACKBURN. And I have no objection to these gentlemen and others changing their views upon questions of great public policy. I do protest, however——

Mr. HERBERT. I wish to say that I have not changed my views. I have simply voted for this often enough; I have got tired of it, and think it is time to stop.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not object to gentlemen changing their views and opinions on questions of great national policy. I take it they have done so from the best motives and on the soundest convictions. But I do submit that the line should be drawn somewhere, and gentlemen should not set themselves up to shape and fashion the law and sentiments of Congress, and shift their convictions upon national policy with apparently the same facility if not the same frequency that they are supposed to change their linen. [Laughter.] They are not fairly leaders of this House and of public sentiment upon any question upon which they can not hold to their own convictions from the adjournment of one Congress to the convening of another.

All I want to say further is this: Let this bill take its course and meet its fate. My duty has been done, however poorly. I sincerely trust that when the consideration of this bill shall be reached, when the decision upon it shall be promulgated and its fate shall be determined, probably within the hour, I do sincerely trust and earnestly hope that it shall be shown conclusively and to the satisfaction of the people of this country that prejudice has not usurped the place of reason, that sentiment has not taken the throne where logic should sit, and that the members of this House, putting behind them all save the obligation that they owe to oath and to conscience, forgetting the results that may come, whether favorable or unfavorable to their peculiar views upon another subject, employing nothing but the calcium light of their own best and clearest intelligence and fairest judgment, will discharge their duties faithfully; and that in the record made by this the popular branch of the American Congress, in which the people's will is thought to find its best expression, here in this popular branch of the law-making power of this Government, our decision upon this matter, aye, sir, upon all matters, shall be such as to vindicate the claim that each and every member here holds to the confidence and faith and the respect of the constituents who sent him. I have done. [Applause.]

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. BLACKBURN. How much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has two minutes remaining.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BLACKBURN. If I have time I will.

Mr. BRUMM. The gentleman asserts or assumes, as I understand, that by the time when these two years have expired the whisky now in bond and to be covered by this bill will have been taken out. Now, if the gentleman is earnest or honest in that assumption, as I presume, of course, he is, why should he not put in this bill a provision that at least one-eighth of this whisky shall be taken out of bond at the end of the first quarter, one-eighth at the end of the second quarter, and so on until the expiration of the two years, and not, as it were, fill the tub so full that at the end of two years, when you undertake to lift it, the bottom will fall out?

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman will allow me to answer him by putting a question. Will he vote for this bill if it be so amended?

Mr. BRUMM. I do not think I shall.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then that is the reason I will not favor such an amendment.

Mr. BRUMM. I put the question to test the honesty of the gentleman's intentions.

Mr. BLACKBURN. And I make the answer to expose the lack of honesty in the suggestion.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I desire to offer an amendment. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will give way for a moment.

Mr. SPRINGER. The motion to strike out the enacting clause is not amendable.

The CHAIRMAN. No amendment is in order.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I make the point of order that the motion to strike out the enacting clause is not in order until general debate has been closed and the bill taken up for consideration by sections.

Mr. KEIFER. Is not general debate closed?

Mr. BLACKBURN. The general debate has closed; but the bill has not yet been taken up for consideration by sections. Let us observe the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] is well taken. The bill will now be read for consideration under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HOPKINS. I desire to offer an amendment at the proper time.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the time within which distilled spirits heretofore entered for deposit and now remaining in distillery warehouses, or special bonded warehouses, upon which the tax has or shall become due after December 1, 1883, are required to be withdrawn therefrom, pursuant to the conditions of any warehousing bond taken upon the entry of such spirits into any such warehouse under the provisions of existing laws of the United States, shall, on written request of the distiller or owner thereof, be extended for a period not exceeding two years from the date the tax has or would have fallen due upon any such distilled spirits under existing laws; but such extension shall not be made in any case unless a new warehousing bond, in a penal sum not less than the amount of the tax, in a form to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, and with sureties satisfactory to the collector of the district in which the warehouse is located, shall be given, conditioned that the principal named in said bond shall pay the tax on the spirits specified therein, and also interest on such tax at the rate of 4½ per cent. per annum for the time of the extension, and within five years from the date of the original entry of such spirits for deposit in warehouse. When any distilled spirits upon which the time for payment of the tax shall become extended under the provisions of this act are regauged for withdrawal from warehouse, the allowance for loss shall be no more than is now authorized for a warehousing period of three years; and the tax, and interest on the tax at the rate above named, shall be collected also upon any excess of loss found upon such regauge at the time of the withdrawal of such spirits.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Georgia to strike out the enacting clause is not debatable.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I beg pardon of the Chair——

The CHAIRMAN. The ruling of the Chair is that this question is not debatable.

The CHAIRMAN proceeded to put the question, but before the result was announced,

Mr. RANDALL said: I call for tellers.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Before this question is finally determined I ask unanimous consent——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is now engaged in putting the question.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BLOUNT and Mr. BLACKBURN were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 131, noes 87.

So the motion to strike out the enacting clause of the bill was agreed to.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the committee rise and report its action to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DORSHEIMER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5265) to extend the time for the payment of the tax on distilled spirits now in warehouse, had directed him to report the same back with a recommendation that the enacting clause be struck out.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon concurring in the report of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union recommending that the enacting clause of the bill be struck out.

Mr. BLOUNT. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I rise to a point of order. I wish to know whether it is not in order now to debate this proposition.

Mr. RANDALL. Oh! I beg the gentleman to let us vote.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent—— [Cries of "Objection!"]

Mr. BLOUNT. I am willing to withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MILLER and Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR renewed the call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 186, nays 83, not voting 52; as follows:

YEAS—186.

So the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union that the enacting clause of the bill be stricken out was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SPRINGER, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names was dispensed with.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I am paired with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SKINNER]. If he were present, he would vote "no" and I would vote "ay" on this proposition to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. I wish to state that my colleague, Mr. LE FEVRE, is paired with General WARNER, of Ohio. My colleague, if he were present, would vote "no."

The SPEAKER. The rules of the House require that the pairs shall be reduced to writing and announced from the Clerk's desk. That was done, the Chair will state, for the purpose of saving confusion.

Mr. POST, of Pennsylvania. Mr. FERRELL, of New Jersey, was called away to be present at a funeral. He would have voted "ay," if present, on this proposition.

Mr. HOOPER. I wish to state, Mr. Speaker, that I did not vote, believing that I was paired with my colleague, Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I therefore ask consent to record my vote.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. It is true, as is stated, that I was paired with Mr. HOOPER until yesterday. I saw him in his seat yesterday and he is here to-day, and so I voted, believing that the pair had expired.

The SPEAKER. It is evidently a mistake, and if there be no objection the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HOOPER] will be allowed to cast his vote.

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. With reference to this pair between my colleague and General WARNER——

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already announced that pairs must be reduced to writing and sent to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. RANDALL. There is a controversy about this pair.

The SPEAKER. Under the circumstances of course the Chair will hear the statement.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. General LE FEVRE left for Philadelphia last night and authorized me to pair him on this vote. I paired him with General WARNER, of Ohio. If Mr. WARNER were present, he would vote "ay," Mr. LE FEVRE "no," on this proposition.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to corroborate that statement. Mr. WARNER called on me last night at 8 o'clock and stated substantially that authority was given to make the arrangement referred to by the gentleman from Ohio. Mr. WARNER, having spoken on the bill, is of course on record with reference to it. The other gentleman may not be. Mr. WARNER is in favor of striking out the enacting clause.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. In connection with this pair I wish also to state that Mr. LE FEVRE, of Ohio, came to me and very urgently asked me to get him a pair last night. I did so. It appears that subsequently he went to his colleague and got him to pair him with another gentleman. I had him paired with Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois, who was on the other side of the bill. I did this at his request. Of course I did not know of any other arrangement.

Mr. SPRINGER. In order that there may be no confusion about the matter, I will withdraw my vote and consent to a pair with my colleague, Mr. THOMAS. I would vote "no" on this proposition; Mr. THOMAS would vote "ay."

The following pairs were announced from the desk:

Mr. HUNT with Mr. KELLOGG, until further notice.

Mr. YOUNG with Mr. BAYNE, until further notice.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana, with Mr. STOCKSLAGER, until further notice.

Mr. GIBSON with Mr. BINGHAM, until further notice.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, with Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, until further notice.

Mr. COBB with Mr. GEORGE, until further notice.

Mr. MCADOO with Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois, on all questions except the bonded-whisky bill, until further notice.

Mr. KASSON with Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina, until further notice, on the bonded extension bill. Mr. KASSON would vote "ay" on this question.

Mr. SKINNER, of North Carolina, with Mr. SKINNER, of New York, until March 30.

Mr. BUCHANAN with Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire, until the 29th of March, inclusive, except upon the bonded extension bill.

Mr. BRAINERD with Mr. HOPKINS, from March 25 until April 2, on the bonded-whisky bill. Mr. HOPKINS would vote "ay" on the pending proposition; Mr. BRAINERD "no."

Mr. YOUNG with Mr. PAYNE, on the bonded extension bill and on tariff bills.

Mr. WARNER, of Tennessee, with Mr. WASHBURN, on the bonded bill.

Mr. BURNES with Mr. CALKINS, on the whisky bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN with Mr. MORSE, on the bonded extension bill. Mr. MORSE would vote "ay," Mr. BUCHANAN "no" on the bill.

Mr. LE FEVRE with Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois, on the bonded bill. Mr. LE FEVRE would vote "ay," Mr. THOMAS would vote "no" on the bill.

Mr. BAYNE with Mr. BOUTELLE, on the bonded bill.

Mr. BROADHEAD with Mr. BISBEE. Mr. BROADHEAD would vote "ay," Mr. BISBEE "no" on the bill.

Mr. LORE with Mr. KEIFER, on the bonded extension bill.

Mr. LIBBEY with Mr. BOWEN, on the bonded extension bill.

Mr. CURTIN with Mr. COOK, on this bill.

Mr. LACEY with Mr. STONE, on this bill. Mr. LACEY would vote "ay" on the pending proposition; Mr. STONE "no."

Mr. JOHN S. WISE with Mr. TOWNSHEND, on all questions, for this day.

Mr. MCCOID. I understood that I was paired with the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. BUCHANAN, who, as I now find, is paired with somebody else. I ask to record my vote on this proposition.

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I am not paired with Mr. RAY on this question. I was paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. MORSE, on this bill. It has been announced that Mr. MORSE would vote "ay" and that I would vote "no" on this bill. I want to state that on this question as it stands I would vote "ay;" that is, to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. WASHBURN. I have been paired with the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. WARNER, on this question, but the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. WILLIS, released me from the pair before the voting commenced.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry: Whether it is in order at this time to move that this bill be referred to the Speaker and to the Committee on Ways and Means of the last Congress, which reported a worse bill than this?

The SPEAKER. The Chair declines to answer that question.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BLOUNT moved to reconsider the vote by which the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, at the request of a number of gentlemen I ask permission for them to print their remarks on this bill. I do not ask that privilege for myself.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PAYSON. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to make a privileged motion. I move to take up now for immediate consideration the bill (H. R. 181) to declare forfeited certain lands granted to aid in the construction of a railroad in Oregon, and to enforce the same by judicial proceedings, and proceed to its consideration.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to antagonize that motion with a motion to proceed to the consideration of House bill 5461, to establish a board of commissioners of interstate commerce, and to regulate said commerce. I presume that question is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. The order of business is not debatable.

Mr. DOWD. I rise to a question of order. I claim that the first business in order is the bill (H. R. 4976) for the retirement and recoinage of the trade-dollar, which was made a special order on the 18th of February.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the bill which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] proposes to consider is not a special order, but is a matter of privilege under a resolution passed by the House some time ago on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]. Of course, as in the case of all other matters of legislation, the question of consideration can be raised against it; and that question is raised by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN]. If the House votes not to proceed at this time with the consideration of the bill called up by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON], then the Chair would be called upon to decide as to the preference among the other special orders.

Mr. COX, of New York. Would it be in order to move that the House do now proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. If the House declines to consider these special orders that motion will be in order.

Mr. COX, of New York. Which comes first.

The SPEAKER. The first is the matter of privilege called up by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the title of the bill called up by the gentleman from Illinois may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 181) to declare forfeited certain lands granted to aid in the construction of a railroad in Oregon, and to enforce the same by judicial proceedings.

Mr. REAGAN. Let the title of the bill which I ask the House to take up be also read.

The SPEAKER. That is not properly before the House at this time, but the Chair will direct the title to be read if the gentleman will send it up.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5461) to establish a board of commissioners of interstate commerce, and to regulate such commerce.

Mr. DOWD. I ask that the title of the bill which I desire to call up, and which is the first special order, be read.

The SPEAKER. That may be done also by unanimous consent.

The title of the bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4976) for the retirement and recoinage of the trade-dollar.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House now consider the bill indicated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON]?

Mr. GEORGE. It will not require over half an hour to consider that bill.

The SPEAKER. The question of the order of business is not debatable.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 70, noes 71.

Mr. HOLMAN. A quorum has not voted.

The SPEAKER. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers; and appoints the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN].

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 75, noes 87.

The SPEAKER. The "noes" have it. The House decides not to proceed with the consideration of the bill indicated by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. REAGAN. I now call up the special order which I have already indicated.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves to proceed with the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5461) to establish a board of commissioners of interstate commerce and to regulate such commerce, and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOWD] moves that the House proceed with the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4976) for the retirement and recoinage of the trade-dollar.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to made a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DINGLEY. If the motion which has been made to proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by the gentleman from Texas should fail, would then the motion be in order that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill to relieve American shipping?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the situation as it exists. There are on the Calendars various special orders made for different dates. The first assignment of a bill as a special order in the House is the bill called up by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOWD]. Of course it is always in the power of the House and not at all in the power of the Chair to decide which one of these orders the House shall consider. When a gentleman calls up a bill which has been assigned as a special order, if the question of consideration is raised against it that is a question for the House to decide.

Mr. COX, of New York. I ask that the Chair cause the list of special orders to be read.

Mr. CHACE. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CHACE. It is that the bill for the retirement and recoinage of the trade-dollar is a special assignment, and should come up first unless the question of consideration is raised against it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has so stated. When the gentleman rom Texas moves to take up his bill and the gentleman from North Carolina moves to take up his, the question must first be taken on the consideration of the bill indicated by the gentleman from North Carolina, because that was assigned by the House as a special order for the earlier day.

Mr. COX, of New York. Would it not be fair to have the list of special orders read to the House?

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether it is the rule that the first assignment has the first vote?

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. REAGAN. I would like to have the rule read.

The SPEAKER. That, at least, has always been the practice.

Mr. REAGAN. They all stand as special orders.

Mr. BLAND. Is it not specified in the order of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] that it shall not interfere with prior orders?

Mr. REAGAN. Is there any rule on the subject?

The SPEAKER. There is no written or printed rule on the subject; but it has always been the practice of the House to take the vote first on the order which was for consideration first by the House.

Mr. BLAND. I desire to submit to the Chair the question of order that these special orders are always made on the condition that they do not conflict with prior orders.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, if there be no objection, will, in accordance with the request which has been made, have the list of special orders read for the purpose of showing to the House the exact situation.

Mr. STEELE and other members called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, that can not be done. The first question is, Will the House proceed to the consideration of the bill called up by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOWD], against which the question of consideration is raised by the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. CHACE. I ask that the title of the bill called up by the gentleman from North Carolina be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4976) for the retirement and recoinage of the trade-dollar.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon proceeding with the consideration of the bill the title of which has been read.

The question was taken, and upon a division there were—ayes 79, noes 43.

Mr. CASSIDY. No quorum has voted.

Mr. REAGAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays, and there were 38 in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. AIKEN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will please state it.

Mr. AIKEN. I find by reference to the Calendar that, under date of February 18, a special order was made assigning a day, the 12th of March, for the consideration of a bill, prior to the day fixed for the one now called up. I wish to know if there is any rule of this House stating in what order these questions are to be considered?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman who had the order made for the 12th of March had chosen to call it up at this time the question would be first taken on the consideration of that order.

Mr. CALKINS. I understand that the question now is upon proceeding to the consideration of the bill for the retirement and recoinage of the silver dollar.

The SPEAKER. That is the question.

Mr. REAGAN. Would it be in order to have read for the information of the House the title of the bill which I desire to call up, and for which purpose I have antagonized this bill?

The SPEAKER. That would be in order if there is no objection.

Mr. CHACE. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that he understands it is the bill for the regulation of interstate commerce. The question now is upon proceeding to consider the special order, being the bill for the retirement and recoinage of the trade-dollar. Upon that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 165, nays 85, not voting 71; as follows:

YEAS—165.

So the House resolved to proceed with the consideration of the special order.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. FERRELL with Mr. RUSSELL, on all political questions, for this day.

Mr. MULLER with Mr. WADSWORTH, until further notice.

TRADE-DOLLAR.

The SPEAKER. The House having resolved to proceed with the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4976) for the retirement and recoinage of the trade-dollar, the bill will now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That until January 1, 1886, United States trade-dollars shall be received at their face value in payment of all dues to the United States, and shall not be again paid out or in any other manner issued.

SEC. 2. That the holder of any United States trade-dollars, on presentation of the same at the office of the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States, may receive in exchange therefor a like amount and value, dollar for dollar, in standard silver dollars of the United States.

SEC. 3. That the trade-dollars received by, paid to, or deposited with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer or national depositary of the United States shall not be paid out or in any other manner issued, but, at the expense of the United State, shall be transmitted to the coinage mints and recoined into standard silver dollars.

SEC. 4. That the trade-dollars so received at the coinage mints shall be regarded and treated as silver bullion, and, at their bullion value, shall be deducted from the amount of bullion required to be purchased and coined by the act of February 28, 1878.

SEC. 5. That all laws and parts of laws authorizing the coinage and issuance of United States trade-dollars are hereby repealed.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOWD] desire to have the report read?

Mr. DOWD. I do not.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to ask the gentleman what time he proposes to allow for general debate on this bill?

Mr. CASSIDY. That is the question I was about to ask.

Mr. DOWD. So far as I am concerned I am willing to limit it to two hours.

Mr. CHACE. I think it is hardly worth while to undertake to fix any limit for debate just yet.

The SPEAKER. This bill being up for consideration in the House, the only way to stop debate upon it is by ordering the previous question.

Mr. CHACE. I do not think the House is ready to limit debate just now.

Mr. REAGAN. The House is ready to pass the bill, and that is all you want.

Mr. DOWD. Mr. Speaker, the single purpose of this bill is to rid the country of what is known as the trade-dollar; it was framed solely with reference to that object. Whatever may be the individual opinions of the members of the committee upon the subject, it is not intended by this bill either to increase or diminish the coinage of silver nor in any way to interfere with or modify the currency laws or the coinage laws, but, leaving them as they are, to provide for converting trade-dollars into standard dollars as a business proposition.

This coin, Mr. Speaker, which a little while ago under the authority of the Government circulated as money, has become an article of merchandise and of traffic. Although it has the stamp of the Government, with the devices and inscriptions of Government coin, declaring that it is worth a hundred cents on the dollar, yet it is a well-known fact that for some time past it has been selling in the market at a discount of from 5 to 15 per cent. There would seem, therefore, to be a necessity for some such legislation as that proposed in this bill. Public convenience would seem to demand it. Whether the bill is so framed as to accomplish the object in view precisely in the way that will be best for the Government and at the same time do exact justice to the holders of this coin is the question for the House now to consider.

There will of course, Mr. Speaker, be some difference of opinion upon the different features of the bill and upon the details; as, for instance, whether it would not be just as well to declare this coin to be a legal tender, as it originally was, and thus restore it to circulation in its present form; also as to whether, if redeemed, it should be at its face value, inasmuch as it has become depreciated and has been bought up to some extent by speculators; and also as to whether, if redeemed for recoinage, it shall constitute a part of the monthly purchase of bullion now required by law.

The proposition to restore it to circulation by declaring it again to be a legal tender presents to my mind a single objectionable feature. It is of the highest importance that all the coins of any given variety should be uniform. Public convenience would seem to require that every coin of a particular denomination shall not only be of uniform weight and value, but also of one type and style and general appearance. As an indication of public sentiment on this subject I may state that of the nine bills referred to our committee only a single one provided for restoring the legal-tender quality; the others were for recoinage.

I may also state in this connection that it will in fact cost the Government nothing to convert the trade-dollar into the standard dollar, the extra quantity of silver which it contains being more than sufficient, as the Director of the Mint informs us, to pay the expense of recoinage, as a trade-dollar, as is well known, contains 7½ grains more of silver than a standard dollar.

It will be contended no doubt that as the Government did not originally issue this coin upon its own account, but only acted as agent of the owners of the bullion, it did not incur any legal obligation and is not bound now to redeem it, especially in the hands of speculators, at a price greater than they paid for it or greater than the market price. Although this proposition would at first view seem plausible, a little reflection, I am sure, will be sufficient to show that such action on the part of the Government now would be not only immoral but impracticable. It is true the Government did not purchase the bullion and manufacture and issue this coin as it now issues the standard dollar and fractional silver, but it did place upon it its great seal and stamp, with the legends, devices, and emblems of national honor and good faith, declaring not only that it was worth a hundred cents in the dollar, but also that it should be a legal tender within a certain limit; and then afterward by its own act—first by a joint resolution of the two Houses and then by a law duly enacted—it stripped this coin of the legal-tender quality and degraded it to the condition of bullion while it was in the hands and pockets of the people, and that too without any sort of notice. So, whatever may have been the obligation of the Government originally, the fact can not be disputed that the Government is alone responsible for the degradation of this coin, and it can not now with honor, in my judgment, refuse to redeem it at its face value, whether it be in the hands of speculators or of innocent and injured owners. It is not the fault of the holder of this coin, whether he be farmer or merchant, mechanic or banker, that it has lost its value as money. The Government itself is to blame; and whatever wrong it has done it is bound by the plainest dictates of common justice to cause speedily to be repaired.

By an act passed February 12, 1873, amending the laws relating to mints, assay offices, and coinage, it was provided (see section 3513, United States Statutes) that—

The silver coins of the United States shall be a trade-dollar, a half-dollar or fifty-cent piece, a quarter-dollar or twenty-five-cent piece, a dime or ten-cent piece. The weight of the trade-dollar shall be 420 grains troy; the weight of the half-dollar shall be twelve grams and a half gram; the quarter-dollar and dime shall be, respectively, one-half and one-fifth of the weight of the said half-dollar; and said coins shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding $5 in any one payment.

By section 18 of the same act (see United States Statutes, section 3517) it is provided that—

Upon the coins of the United States there shall be the following devices and legends: Upon one side there shall be an impression emblematic of liberty, with the inscription of the word "liberty" and the year of the coinage, and upon the reverse shall be the figure or representation of an eagle, with the inscription, "United States of America" and "E pluribus unum;" but on the gold dollar and three-dollar piece, the dime, 5, 3, and 1 cent pieces the figure of the eagle shall be omitted; and on the reverse of the silver trade-dollar the weight and fineness of the coin shall be inscribed.

Under the foregoing provisions of law trade-dollars were coined and issued as follows:

On February 28, 1878, was passed over the veto of President Hayes "An act to authorize the coinage of the standard silver dollar and restore its legal-tender character," which provides that—

There shall be coined at the several mints of the United States silver dollars of the weight of 412½ grains troy, of standard silver, * * * which coins, together with all silver dollars heretofore coined by the United States of like weight and fineness, shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for all debts and dues, public and private, except where otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract.

This is what is familiarly known as the Bland silver bill, and the members of the House and Senate seem to have been so attracted by its excellent features and so exercised as to the President's veto that they entirely overlooked what seems to me to be a most extraordinary feature in the bill. It provides for the coinage of a silver dollar containing 7½ grains less of silver than the trade-dollar, and consequently of less value intrinsically, and makes it a legal tender, and at the same time takes away the legal-tender quality of the trade-dollar, with its 7½ grains more of silver. It is true that a joint resolution of the Senate and House adopted shortly theretofore had contained a provision "that the trade-dollar shall not hereafter be a legal tender;" but the sense of that resolution was distinctly recognized and reaffirmed in the act above referred to by the words "all silver dollars heretofore coined by the United States of like weight and fineness shall be a legal tender."

Why the trade-dollar, with all the insignia, devices, mottoes, and inscriptions of the standard dollar, and one added showing to the world that it contained seven and a half grains more of silver than the standard dollar, should be stripped of its monetary functions and relegated to the condition of merchandise and bullion, while the standard dollar with seven and one-half grains less of silver is made a legal tender for all debts and dues, public and private, is a legislative conumdrum which, so far as I know, no one has yet attempted to explain.

But aside from considerations of public morality and good faith, it would be impracticable to redeem this coin at what it cost its present owners. Some have paid one price and some another. Some have held it longer than others. The rate of interest being different in different localities, that would enter into the calculation as a part of the cost. Some merchants and trades-people have taken it in exchange for merchandise at prices a little in advance of the regular rates. How would you ascertain the cost in all these cases? You would have to establish a sort of bureau, with judges and experts and accountants, to fix the rate of redemption for each separate case.

Upon the fourth section of the bill, Mr. Speaker, there is a minority report, and upon that, of course, there will be some discussion and some difference of opinion. That section provides that when these trade-dollars are redeemed they shall constitute a part of the bullion purchase now required by law of $2,000,000 per month. Here I beg to again call the attention of the House to the fact that it is not intended by this bill that there shall be any restriction upon the coinage of silver. Under this bill precisely the same number of standard dollars are to be issued annually, monthly, daily, and hourly, if you please, as is now required by law. The only difference is that the purchase of bullion by the Government may possibly be suspended for two or three months, the estimate being that there are about $6,000,000 of this coin now in existence.

If the objection is that we are going to depreciate the bullion market, the only answer I have to make is that I do not understand how we can legislate specially in the interest of those who have bullion to sell any more than we can legislate specially in favor of those who have corn to sell, or cotton or whisky to sell; and inasmuch as the first section of the bill provides that until the 1st of January, 1886, trade-dollars shall be received for all public dues, the effect of the bill will be not to diminish, but in fact to increase the circulation of silver temporarily.

For my own part I do not regard the fourth section of the bill as of very great importance one way or the other, but as an indication of public sentiment I may state that of the nine bills relating to the subject under consideration by our committee but a single one provided that the redeemed trade-dollars should not be a part of the regular bullion purchase.

The number of trade-dollars that will likely find their way to the mints for recoinage is so small in comparison with the great volume of coin now on hand, that I do not believe the effect will be perceptible, whether the recoinage is a part of or in addition to the regular bullion supply. The Director of the Mint estimates that there are not exceeding $7,000,000 trade-dollars now in this country. I submitted above some statistics furnished me by that courteous and efficient officer showing the annual and total coinage of trade-dollars. It was thought that this coin, by reason of its added weight, would be specially attracted to Eastern countries between which and the United States there is extensive intertraffic, and thus an outlet would be provided for the productions of our silver mines.

The following statistics, also furnished me by the Director of the Mint, shows the annual exportation of trade-dollars from the ports of New York and San Francisco up to the year 1878, when their coinage ceased:

| Year. | From New York. | From San Francisco. | Total. |
|---|---|---|---|
| 1874 | $900,000 | $2,100,000 | $3,000,000 |
| 1875 | 400,000 | 4,400,000 | 4,800,000 |
| 1876 | 280,000 | 4,500,000 | 4,780,000 |
| 1877 | 417,938 | 8,254,658 | 8,672,596 |
| 1878 | 937,015 | 4,778,991 | 5,166,006 |
| Total | | | 26,418,602 |

Since 1878 other exportations have been made, and also some importations. Some of these coins have doubtless gone abroad in the pockets of individuals, while others have been brought back by immigrants and travelers; some have been lost by shipwreck, fires, &c., and some have been melted up by artisans, jewelers, and others.

In this connection I submit the following extract from the last report of the Director of the Mint:

Probably from five to seven millions of these coins are now held in the country, mostly in the mining and manufacturing regions of Pennsylvania and contiguous States and in the vicinity of New York, where they have been paid to workmen and laborers, and by them paid to and received from tradesmen in those localities.

While the United States has incurred no legal liability, yet by the act of the Government the coins were at first put into circulation and given compulsory currency, and have fallen into the hands of those who can ill afford to suffer from the depreciation, and it would seem but an act of justice that the United States should permit these coins to be sent to the mints and exchanged for other silver coins, into which they could be profitably recoined.

I doubt not that action of this kind would long since have been taken but for the apprehension that a large number of exported trade-dollars would be returned to this country. My own investigations and inquiries have satisfied me that the trade-dollars sent to China have gone to the melting-pots and become sycee-silver or disappeared in the interior of that country; for, although their value as silver bullion would be only about 87 cents, yet their commercial market value in New York city has, prior to the late movement to depress their price, fallen below 98 cents but once, and that for a short period, and has usually ranged for several years above 99 cents, and had it been possible to secure trade-dollars for import from China to this country the profits on the operation would have brought them here long since.

Mr. Speaker, if this bill becomes a law we shall have disposed of the trade-dollar by converting it into an inferior coin, the standard dollar. To produce uniformity we are leveling downward. What will we do with the standard dollar after a while? It is 17 cents below par now intrinsically and in the markets of the world, and is relatively depreciating every day, owing to the increased production of silver as compared with gold. I have said it is inferior by 7½ grains to the trade-dollar that we are now preposing to fling into the crucible. Still we continue to strike them from our mints at the minimum rate of twenty-four millions a year, to go into heaps and piles in the vaults of the Treasury rather than into circulation. There was on March 1 in the Treasury about one hundred and twenty-seven millions of silver coin, and the quantity is being daily increased. Of the twenty-eight millions coined the last fiscal year only some three millions have left the Government vaults. Why does not more of it go out into circulation?

Some say the officers of the Government are opposed to it; others say the banks are making war upon it. My opinion is that the greatest obstacle in the way of the circulation of the silver dollar is the silver dollar itself. It is the most inconvenient and undesirable of all kinds of money. If the Government would coin more fractional silver of a little better quality and fewer standard dollars there would in my opinion be a great deal more of silver in circulation. Silver halves, quarters, and dimes are an attractive and convenient currency, very popular among the people everywhere, and an unlimited quantity of them might be absorbed and used in business. But you may as well suppose that lead will not sink when thrown into a mill-pond as that the heavy and bulky, unwieldy and weighty dollar coins will not be shoveled into heaps and piles in safes and vaults whenever forced into circulation beyond a very limited extent. No one can carry them upon his person in any considerable quantity, and you might almost as well make money out of iron—better make it out of rags, according to a late decision of the Supreme Court.

No one will accept silver dollars while there is any other kind of money to be had. They are always the refuse, the very last resort; at home because of their inconvenient size and weight, and abroad because of their deficiency in quality or fineness of material. Though we are casting them from the molds at the rate of more than 70,000 per day, yet before a great while they may all have to be again thrown into the melting-pot.

When the balance of trade shall be against us, when the number of standard dollars in the Treasury is so large and the amount of gold relatively so small, and our foreign balances are obliged to be paid in gold, then our troubles may begin in earnest.

Depositors who have put gold dollars in bank will hardly be willing to receive a coin worth but 83 cents in the dollar, and a bank, on the other hand, which has received on deposit a coin worth 83 per cent. of its face value will not likely be willing to pay out gold dollars worth 100 cents in any part of the civilized world. It is an economic fact known as far back as the time of Aristophanes that when good money and bad money are thrown in circulation together the bad money drives out the good money. Hence gold will cease to circulate as money and again be at a premium; there will be no fixed standard of value, and financial disorder and ruin will be the inevitable consequence. We have had our own sad experience with depreciated paper money. England many years ago had a memorable crisis with clipped and mutilated metallic money. One of her brightest historians, speaking of the depreciated coin in the days of the clippers, uses this language:

> It may well be doubted whether all the misery which has been inflicted on the English nation in a quarter of a century by bad kings, bad ministers, bad parliaments, and bad judges was equal to the misery caused in a single year by bad crowns and bad shillings. * * * When the great instrument of exchange became thoroughly deranged, all trade, all industries were smitten as with a palsy. The evil was felt daily and hourly in almost every place and by almost every class, in the dairy and on the threshing-floor, by the anvil and by the loom, on the billows of the ocean and in the depth of the mine. Nothing could be purchased without a dispute.
> Over every counter there was wrangling from morning till night. The workman and his employer had a quarrel as regularly as Saturday came round. On a fair-day or market-day the clamors, the reproaches, the taunts, the curses, were incessant, and it was well if no booth was overturned and no head broken. The simple and the careless were pillaged without mercy by extortioners, whose demands grew even more rapidly than the money shrank. Men of business were often bewildered by the confusion into which all pecuniary transactions were thrown, while the ignorant and helpless peasant was cruelly ground between one class which would give money only by tale and another which would take it only by weight.

So we have experience in our own and other countries as well as the plainest dictates of justice and public policy to admonish us to look well to the purity and stability of our circulating medium. It is of the very highest importance that the great instrument for effecting exchanges shall be fixed and permanent. It is the standard of value as the yardstick and steelyard-pea are the standard of quantity and weight. Every interest, every department of business, every class of our people, the behests of the public welfare, imperatively demand that the currency, especially the coined money, shall be stable and of fixed value. Therefore the highest object and aim of the legislator should be to enhance the permanency, uniformity, and value of the coin circulation. Whoever would tamper with it or experiment with it whereby to depreciate or degrade it or to render it fluctuating, whatever may be his motive, is worse than an enemy to the public good.

One single act of Congress at any time injuriously affecting the currency, metallic or paper, by undue contraction or expansion, might be infinitely worse than a foreign war. It is certainly not the purpose of this bill at all to contract nor to materially increase the coinage and circulation of silver, but, as I stated in the outset, to redeem a degraded currency by converting trade-dollars into standard dollars, without disturbing values or the existing volume of circulation, simply as a business transaction.

Mr. PUSEY. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, I desire briefly to submit some arguments in advocacy of the provisions of this bill.

The trade-dollar in no sense constitutes any part of the circulating medium of this country to-day. The public policy and national good faith require its speedy retirement. Under the provisions of this short bill this can be accomplished without loss to the country or without loss to the present holders of this anomalous coin.

The provisions of this bill are simple, direct, equitable, and comprehensive. Section 1 reaches that class of holders who are remote from our subtreasuries. My people have not a subtreasury within five hundred miles of them. Other gentlemen on this floor represent constituencies who have not a subtreasury within one thousand miles of them.

Section 1 provides for those holders by making this coin receivable for public dues. They can walk across the street to the deputy collectors of internal revenue and buy their revenue stamps or they can go to the post-office and buy their post-office stamps and use the coin at par. Section 2 provides for the large holders in those great money centers, where they can use it by going immediately to the subtreasury and getting the standard silver dollars in exchange. Section 3 provides that these trade-dollars shall be sent by these treasurers and subtreasurers to the coinage mints of the country to be recoined into standard dollars, thereby giving to the country a uniform silver circulation.

Now, I will say, Mr. Speaker, within parliamentary usage, I hope, that up to section 4 of this bill the committee were practically unanimous, but when we reached section 4 there was a division, and there is a minority report of this committee on the provisions of that section. That provides that when this coin is sent to the coinage mints it shall be treated as silver bullion and deducted from the monthly purchases of silver bullion by the Treasury. Our chairman, who is the author of the minority report, says: "I do not want the law of February 28, 1878, interfered with." I say in reply that practically we do not interfere with it. There is one provision of that law that requires the Treasury of the United States to purchase monthly not less than $2,000,000 of silver bullion.

Now, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the committee, why is it that that provision was put in there? Was it not to enable the Treasury of the United States or the mints of the United States to coin not less than 2,000,000 per month of standard dollars? It was not put in there for any such purpose as to make a steady market of $2,000,000 a month to silver-bullion dealers. We do not legislate in that direction. You practically do not affect the monthly coinage of standard dollars. The clink and music of the Bland dollar will be heard just as it is now. The Government of this country will still take $7,200,000 per annum as seigniorage on this money of the people. Now, is this a strike at the silver-bullion dealer? By no means. We are under no obligation to furnish a market for him. You ask, what will he do? He will do precisely as my farmers do, store the product until there is a market for it, with the certain assurance that the Government is a purchaser within a very few months.

In round numbers, there have been thirty-five millions of this anomalous money coined. It is estimated by the statistics of our custom-houses, the manifests of our vessels, as to the approximate amounts brought by immigrants to this country, that all of this $35,000,000, with the exception of possibly $7,000,000, have in those dusky nations of the East gone into the coinage of the sycee-silver, into subsidiary coin, into ornaments, and into the arts, so that there is left practically, at the maximum calculation, in all not to exceed $8,000,000.

I think, Mr. Speaker, the argument on this whole bill should rest here. We have suffered ourselves to issue a coin, the trade-dollar, for foreign circulation. The Constitution gives us control over the coinage of silver and gold, the regulation of its value, and the regulation of foreign coins within the United States. But here is a native coin for foreign circulation. I will admit, Mr. Speaker, that it is the child of an impure alliance. Yet the Government finds itself in the position that it has to assume the guardianship of this prodigal. It has on it the devices and insignia of this Government, and the honor and good faith of this nation demand that it shall be redeemed.

It may be said that speculators of this country have this coin. That may be true to some extent. But is not that true of every commodity? But the fact is that outside of the great moneyed centers this coin is scattered among the laborers of this country. I will say as a practical business man that I know of thousands of dollars of this anomalous coin that are deposited in the banks of the country as a special deposit. Under the provisions of this law the man who has $10, $20, or $50 can walk right across the street and get dollar for dollar in revenue-stamps and postage-stamps.

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, what latitude this debate may take. I have very strong convictions on this silver question. But I doubt, unless it is dragged into this debate, whether it is in good taste to express those views now, and I shall not do so unless the further discussion of this bill may render it necessary.

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BUCKNER). The gentleman has fifty minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. PUSEY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EVANS].

Mr. EVANS, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me to be somewhat unfortunate that we should have a currency the component parts of which are of such unequal values. Assuming the gold dollar to be the standard by which the remainder of the currency is measured, a brief statement will demonstrate this inequality.

The standard silver dollar contains 412.5 grains of standard silver, and is made the equivalent of the gold dollar in the payment of debts both public and private, being made by legislation a legal-tender, and is worth in the markets of the world at the present price of silver about 86 cents. The trade-dollar weighs 420 grains, and, not being a legal tender, is worth only its value as bullion, which at present rates ranges from 86 to 90 cents. The half-dollar weighs only 192.9 grains. Two of them, making a dollar, weigh 395.8 grains, equivalent to about 82 or 83 cents. The quarters and dimes weigh proportionately.

The halves and quarters are legal tenders to the amount of $5, and the dimes and half dimes to 25 cents. In paper, we have the United States notes made a legal tender and redeemable in gold and silver at the pleasure of the Government, and the national-bank currency a legal tender in settlements between the banks, but not a legal tender in discharge of bank obligations between man and man.

It will thus be seen that we have a heterogeneous currency of various values; and although the disadvantage of such a currency is not strongly felt in our internal commerce, it manifests itself whenever our silver currency comes into contact with the commerce of the external world, where it can only pass at its marketable value.

The principal complaint at present concerning our currency as used in our own domestic commerce arises from the anomalous condition of the trade-dollar, which is heavier than our standard dollar, yet not a legal tender in payment of debts.

When the German Empire in 1871 discontinued the use of silver by changing its standard to gold it was estimated that there was in circulation in that country nearly $350,000,000 in silver coin.

The nations of the Latin Union by their restricted use of silver, almost demonetizing it, added largely to the bulk of the unused silver. This vast amount it was believed would thus be thrown on the markets of the world. Our own mines at that time were beginning to produce silver in much larger quantities than had ever been done before, and the prospect was that the great influx to the mining regions would produce a still greater supply, which anticipation has been realized. The price of silver in the markets of the world was evidently on the decline, and it became a problem as to what we should do with our rapidly increasing production.

As our commerce with China was mostly on a silver basis, it occurred to some of our statesmen that a market for part of our silver could be found there, and the result was the coinage of our so-called trade-dollar of 420 grains of silver. Being heavier than the Spanish or Mexican dollar, it soon became popular with the Chinese.

The whole amount coined, in round numbers, is about $36,000,000. Of this amount it is estimated from the best information obtainable that only seven or eight millions remain in this country, and that the remainder has been absorbed in the commerce of China or gone into Chinese melting-pots because of its weight being greater than that of the Spanish or Mexican dollar, silver money in China passing more by weight than by tale.

You are aware that authority to coin trade-dollars was given under the act of February 12, 1873, and in the following words: "The silver coins of the United States shall be a trade-dollar, a half dollar or fifty-cent piece, a quarter-dollar or twenty-five-cent piece." The act defines the relative proportion of pure silver and alloy in the trade-dollar, and directs that the devices and legends upon it shall be the same as other coins of the United States. The same act made it a legal tender with other designated coins of said act to the extent of $5. It also bore on its face the certificate of the United States that it was of a certain weight and fineness. Relying on this certificate and pledge of the nation, it became a current coin at home as well as abroad, and debts to the amount of millions were paid by it. It has been asserted that it was never intended for home circulation, and that the legislative purpose of its creation was to promote trade with China and other Asiatic countries by making a coin that would be acceptable to these people. While this may be true, the specific object was not made known by the law; there was no prohibitory clause; on the other hand, it led the people to believe that it was just as much a coin of the United States as any of the other legalized issues; for the act expressly says the "silver coins of the United States shall be a trade-dollar, a half-dollar, quarter-dollar, and a dime." The same act further recognized it by declaring it to be a crime to counterfeit any of the coins of the United States; also the later act of 1877 made it a crime to counterfeit any of our coins, and as the trade-dollar had been declared one of our coins, it was a crime to counterfeit it.

As a reason for not redeeming them it has been claimed that they did not go into circulation until after the passage of the act of 1876, which took away their legal-tender quality. It has been shown by the statistics of coinage and exports that at that date two millions more had been coined than had been exported. To me, however, this is an argument to which I attach very little value or importance. After having made them a legal tender, I claim the Government had no right to take away that quality without first passing a law for their redemption.

The Government certainly has no just right to take away the legal-tender quality of its obligations at will. If so, it can take away with equal justice the legal-tender quality of the present standard dollar. The Government has no more right to break its contracts than a private individual or a corporation.

Suppose that in the capacity of a banker I should issue promissory notes, say for $100 each, payable in a given time or on demand, how would I be regarded or thought of by all honest business people if I were to say that notwithstanding these notes bear on their face the promise to pay in full, they were not worth more than $85 each, and that I would not pay more than that amount for them? On my refusal to pay their full face value the law would be appealed to, and would say: "This is a dishonest transaction; you have made an obligation, it is your duty to fulfill it; it is a contract, and the law of contracts is a just law, and can not be broken without incurring its penalty." But I claim that some, at least, of my paper has fallen into the hands of speculators, who have purchased it at a discount; therefore I ought not to be compelled to pay in full. How weak and flimsy the argument, the law would very justly say; no matter what your paper brought in the market, you are bound for its face value. The United States Government might have said with equal justice when her bonds were below par that she would not pay them in full. This would be nothing more nor less than repudiation. After a struggle of more than four years to preserve the Union, at a cost of nearly $7,000,000,000, and after having paid all this indebtedness but $1,800,000,000, shall we now repudiate our own coin, some of which has been used to pay a part of that indebtedness?

The cry that the trade-dollars are in the hands of speculators, and therefore ought not to be redeemed at their face value, I am led to believe must have had its influence with the President, for in his first message to this Congress he recommends that "provision be made for their reception by the Treasury and the mints as bullion at a small percentage above the current market price of silver of like fineness."

For the fluctuating value of the trade-dollar speculators have been blamed, but the real fault lay in the action of Congress that made speculation possible. Had it permitted its legal-tender power to remain, speculation would have been impossible, for the amount in circulation was so restricted that it would not accumulate to such an extent in any one hand as to render its use at its full value impracticable. Even if it were true that they are mostly in the hands of speculators, it would be no good and sufficient reason why they should not be redeemed at their face value. I propose to show, however, that they are not, as is generally supposed, in the hands of speculators, but are held by banks, bankers, trades-people, and private individuals.

On the 15th of January last I sent a circular letter to the banks, bankers, and trust companies of my State (Pennsylvania) requesting them to give me an account of their own holdings and the amount held by them for private parties; also to state what number were held at face value and what number at a discount? In addition thereto the newspapers very generally throughout the State notified the people that I was making such an investigation, and requested them, if the holders of any of the depreciated coin, to communicate with me. The result was I received nearly three hundred letters to my inquiries.

I will now send to the Clerk's desk an inventory made from the different amounts reported and the manner in which they are held. I will not ask that the names be read, only the heading and footings of the list.

The Clerk read as follows:

An inventory of the number of trade-dollars taken and now held by banks, bankers, trust companies, and private individuals at their face value and at a discount in the State of Pennsylvania:

|---|---|
| Banks, bankers, and trust companies at par | 796,749 |
| Private individuals and societies | 1,641,134 |
| At a discount from 10 to 15 per cent | 123,044 |
| Total | 2,560,927 |

Mr. EVANS, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I have made this inventory with a great deal of care, believing it to be the only correct way of arriving at the amount of trade-dollars in the country and the manner in which they were held. If a member from each State had instituted the same inquiry we would have been able to-day to give a very correct estimate of the number to be redeemed. I believe the people of my State hold nearly one-third of the whole amount. They had confidence, and still have the same confidence, that a great Government like ours will not repudiate a coin of its own issue, but will either redeem it at par or exchange it for some other coin which will possess the same legal-tender quality the trade-dollar once had.

You will notice that less than 5 per cent. of the whole amount held in Pennsylvania are at a discount; the remainder, 2,437,883, are held and were taken at par; out of this number 1,641,134 are held at par by private individuals, benevolent, beneficiary, and religious societies. If it had not been for the banks many thousands more would have been in the hands of the people, for they took them at par to relieve the people in the payment of notes and on deposit for a considerable time after they were discredited. As an evidence of the spirit which prompted the trades-people of my State to take trade-dollars at their face value, I desire to read the following letter from one of my constituents, who is widely known as one of the largest merchants of Philadelphia:

DEAR SIR: In answer to your inquiry, we have perhaps a little over $125,000 in trade-dollars on hand. We did not advertise to take them, but felt it was a measure of relief to poor people who had them on hand at the time the scare began, who, if compelled to sell them to the brokers, would have suffered a serious loss, which would have entailed in some cases positive suffering. We felt that it was important to set an example to other trades-people, to lead them to take them, and we did it in confidence that the Government would not let the people suffer, and that proper legislation would be had when Congress met.

So far as my personal knowledge goes, there has not been large speculation by capitalists in trade-dollars, and business people who sold their goods at gold prices are the holders of the trade-dollars.

I would be very glad to give you any information on the subject that I can, and trust you will use your able influence to relieve those who have expressed their confidence in the stamp of the United States on its coin.

Yours, with great respect,

JOHN WANAMAKER.

I will also take the liberty to read a portion of a letter from a retired merchant of my district:

DEAR FRIEND: I am not now in the mercantile business; nevertheless am interested in its success, and will endeavor to give you some information as to what classes of people in this section are the holders of trade-dollars. My successor in business holds four hundred of them, taken at par, principally from the laboring classes; all the storekeepers, millers, and other business men of this portion of Bucks County hold individually all the way from fifty to five hundred of them at par, taken principally from the poor and laboring classes of people, who could not afford to lose. There is another class who hold a large amount, and who are living in the hope that Congress will soon come to the rescue; it is the farmers. I know from my own knowledge that nearly every farmer in this section holds from one to fifty dollars that they had on hand when the panic started, some of them in the hands of renters who had laid them away to pay rent.

You and I know very well that the farmers as a class can not afford to sacrifice their hard-earned money at a discount of 15 per cent. Shame on any government that would refuse or even hesitate to redeem its coin at par.

Wishing you success in your efforts, I am, yours truly,

W. F. P.

In many instances they are held by women who have their own living to make. I have one instance reported of a poor widow who follows day-labor who is the holder of thirty trade-dollars.

Three little boys have written me; one writes:

I have two trade-dollars and my brother, aged 6, has one; we took them for a dollar. I was 10 years old last May.

Another writes:

I have five trade-dollars. I am 12 years old. I traded five Bland dollars for five trade-dollars. I made a bad trade, unless the Government helps me out. I heard you were going to attend to this. Some more boys here are in the same fix. I will lose nearly $1 if the Government don't help me out. I thought the trade-dollar was the best.

Yours, WILLIE HILL.

It may be said by some that these boys are but trifling holders and therefore scarcely worthy of notice. Not so; I regard them as among the most important, for the perpetuity of this Government will rest upon these boys when we shall have long since passed from our labors. Shall we, then, destroy the confidence of the youth of the country who are growing up to manhood by telling them that we do not regard our obligations? I hope, Mr. Chairman, that this Congress will not be guilty of setting such an example.

And shall we say to poor hard-working men and women that notwithstanding the Government made this dollar, then said it was a legal tender, and in order that nobody might be misled or deceived put its own stamp upon it, and also put upon it "In God we trust," as if to impress the innocent and unwary holder with the idea that this great Government, founded on justice and equal rights, would not say a false thing or do an unjust act, but nevertheless it only contains 86 cents' worth of silver, therefore we can not afford to pay you more than that amount for it? In 1876 Congress took away its legal-tender quality and said, "We will no longer recognize the trade-dollar as one of our coins." This action on the part of Congress was a great injustice to the people, for it left upon their hands a mere disk of silver bullion of no more value as an instrument for the payment of debts than a silver bar.

The principal opposition to this bill comes from those who are interested in the bullion market. They tell us that if counted as a part of the monthly purchase of bullion it will depreciate the market value of silver. It is hardly possible that the amount offered for redemption can exceed $10,000,000. This could only arrest Government purchase for a very short period.

We should not lose sight of the fact that the trade-dollar was once a legal tender. Its demonetization by Congress has been regarded as an injustice to the people and a breach of faith on the part of the Government. That being the case, why not use it to make a legal tender now? Not by proclaiming it in its present form a legal-tender dollar, for that would be to add at once and by a single act several millions to the silver currency of the nation, with which the channels of commerce are supersaturated already. We are coining silver into dollars faster than the wants of commerce demand, as is further evidenced by the overflow into the Treasury, and therefore need no additional stimulus in that direction.

The plan adopted by the committee seems to be in accordance with the recommendations of the Director of the Mint and the Secretary of the Treasury, and is in my judgment the best that could be presented to this House. It provides:

That until January 1, 1886, United States trade-dollars shall be received at their face value in payment of all dues to the United States, and shall not be again paid out or in any other manner issued.

SEC. 2. That the holder of any United States trade-dollars, on presentation of the same at the office of the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States, may receive in exchange therefor a like amount and value, dollar for dollar, in standard silver dollars of the United States.

SEC. 3. That the trade-dollars received by, paid to, or deposited with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer or national depositary of the United States shall not be paid out or in any other manner issued, but, at the expense of the United States, shall be transmitted to the coinage mints and recoined into standard silver dollars.

SEC. 4. That the trade-dollars so received at the coinage mints shall be regarded and treated as silver bullion, and, at their bullion value, shall be deducted from the amount of bullion required to be purchased and coined by the act of February 28, 1878.

SEC. 5. That all laws and parts of laws authorizing the coinage and issuance of United States trade-dollars are hereby repealed.

As I am opposed to the further coinage of silver dollars under the act of 1878, it might appear inconsistent on my part to advocate the recoinage of the trade-dollars; but the people must be relieved of a demonetized coin and the credit of the Government must be maintained. After we have done this, I am free to say that I am in favor of the repeal or the suspension of the silver-coinage act of 1878.

If we pass this bill the amount of silver coinage will not be increased; we will get rid of the anomalous coin, and will not artificially inflate the silver currency, but will leave the amount to be coined as under the existing law.

I regard, then, this method of redemption preferable to the proposition to legalize them by restoring their legal-tender quality or by purchase and recoinage into standard dollars, in addition to our present monthly coinage, for the following reasons:

First. It will not increase the silver coinage over that already authorized.

Second. It will avoid two standards for the silver dollar. It would be unwise and inexpedient to have one dollar of more intrinsic value than the other by reason of its greater weight.

Third. It will be the means of taking them out of circulation. If we legalize them they would remain in circulation on account of their greater value, and thereby defeat the object we wish to accomplish, namely, "one standard silver dollar."

In view, then, of the fact that the trade-dollar was once made a legal tender by act of Congress, and subsequently demonetized by it; that several millions are yet in the hands of the people, who took them at their face value; that circumstances over which they had no control have depressed them to the mere value of bullion; that under the existing condition of things they can be made the sport of speculators and kept at ever-varying values; that business done by their aid is done at a sacrifice and great disadvantage, to the benefit of a few and the loss of many; that it is an anomalous, disturbing, and uncertain element of value in our monetary system, it seems to me it would be wisdom as well as an act of justice on the part of Congress to withdraw them from circulation, and that the easiest and best way to do it with the least loss to the people is by the plan suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury and embodied in this bill. In so doing the Government would be no loser, and the people who took them at their nominal value would not be compelled to lose from 12 to 15 per cent. of the wages of their labor or the price of their commodities in the payment of which they had been taken; and the metallic currency of our country would be purged of an anomalous disk, which has embarrassed and perplexed the people in their daily business transactions, oftentimes to their loss, and of late to their great annoyance.

Nearly a year has elapsed since these coins have gone out of circulation. They are, as has been clearly shown, in the hands of the people, who are patiently holding on to them, and losing the annual interest, or the use of the money they represent, in the hope that Congress will redeem them at their nominal value.

We have been tardy in our action to right a wrong, and have spent much valuable time over matters of very much less importance. Let us now, Mr. Speaker, pass this bill without one dissenting voice.

Mr. CALKINS. I ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PUSEY] to yield me five minutes of his time.

Mr. PUSEY. I yield the gentleman from Indiana five minutes.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to ask some questions of the committee that they may answer them in the course of the debate. I understand that there were originally coined about $36,000,000, in round numbers, of this species of coin.

Mr. CHACE. Thirty-five million nine hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. CALKINS. It is no matter about the exact amount. There were about twenty-seven millions of them exported and employed in the Eastern trade, which are now held principally in China. That leaves about nine millions in circulation, or something like that, in this country.

Mr. SMITH. The estimated amount is $7,200,000.

Mr. CALKINS. Now the question I want to propound to the committee and have explained to the House is this: What provision is there in this bill to prevent the amount that is now in the hands of the foreign holders from being shipped back in payment of customs dues and piled up in the Treasury? Secondly, what will be gained by having these dollars that are in the hands of the people of this country recoined? If it be a fact that they are in the hands of the merchants, then they are there by reason of their having been in circulation. If it be a fact they have been bought up by the brokers and are being held by them, then why not adopt some provision such as is contained in the bill introduced by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND], making them a legal tender, putting them on the same basis as standard silver dollars, and letting the brokers put them out?

Mr. CHACE. If the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. CALKINS. In a moment. The next question I want to propound is, why is this section 4 in the bill? What is the purpose of that section? Is it to prevent the further coinage of the standard silver dollar?

Mr. REED. No such luck, I am afraid.

Mr. CALKINS. In the next place, Mr. Speaker, a question I should like to have the committee also explain to the House is this: Why is there not a provision in the bill—but before I propound the question I may as well state a fact. It is generally understood that these dollars that are in the hands of foreigners have been "chopped," as it is called, marked, altered. Why is there not a provision in this bill discriminating against those chopped dollars?

Mr. CHACE. I suppose the gentleman does not want that question answered now either?

Mr. CALKINS. The gentleman can answer it in his own time.

These are dollars which have been chopped by the Chinese Government and bear the stamp of that government.

These, Mr. Speaker, are some of the objections against this bill that are apparent to me at first blush; and when gentlemen come to discuss it I hope they will inform the House fully upon those points as well as the many other manifest errors there are in the bill. That is all that I desire to say at present.

Mr. CHACE. I will give the gentleman from Indiana one minute more to point out the other manifest errors he has referred to.

Mr. SMITH rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] of the committee is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BLAND. I understood two gentlemen from Pennsylvania desire to occupy some time, and that they will come in place of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARDY] a member of the committee, who is absent.

The SPEAKER. Is it understood the gentleman fron New York [Mr. HARDY] has yielded his time to other gentlemen?

Mr. BLAND. That I do not know.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SMITH] state that the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARDY] has yielded him a part of his time?

Mr. SMITH. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. If no one else rises to take the floor, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SMITH]. And if he obtains the floor, he is entitled to it for one hour by the rules of the House.

Mr. DOWD. I will take the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOWD] is entitled to the floor and has forty-five minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. DOWD. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. NUTTING].

Mr. SMITH. I understood the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARDY] was entitled to one hour.

The SPEAKER. And the Chair expressly inquired of the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether the gentleman from New York had allotted time to him, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania said he had not.

Mr. SMITH. I was informed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] that the gentleman from New York would not occupy his time, and at his suggestion my colleague [Mr. EVANS] and myself went to your desk, when the chair was occupied by another than yourself, and made arrangements to occupy that time.

Mr. BLAND. The gentlemen from Pennsylvania came to me for the purpose of obtaining time, and I mentioned the fact that the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARDY] would probably be absent and they might occupy his time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair simply follows the usual custom of first recognizing those members of the committee reporting the measure who may desire to speak.

Mr. SMITH. I do not desire to interfere with that custom.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will endeavor to secure to the gentleman an opportunity to be heard. The gentleman from New York [Mr. NUTTING] is entitled to the floor in the time of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOWD].

TRADE-DOLLAR.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill for the retirement and recoinage of the trade-dollar.

Mr. NUTTING. I think it fair to say that the degree of the superiority of a nation and of its prosperity may always be known by the condition in which we find its currency. Every nation assumes the right to manufacture and put forth a unit of exchange; that is a matter of necessity. They have the right to do this in order to have some medium by which they may balance accounts between themselves and the people who constitute the nation.

If that be true, then it becomes of importance that nations shall take care to act wisely and honestly in dealing with their own currency. Where a nation assumes the right and the sole right to manufacture a currency, it should be held to a strict account as to how it deals with it, how it acts with it. It should be held to a strict account as to what it does, and to the same degree of strictness as individuals are held in their dealings with one another. A nation has no right to put forth to its own people or to the world a currency, and then by any act of its own depreciate the value of that currency. It becomes a matter of honesty and integrity and fair dealing on the part of the nation, just as it would become a matter of honesty and integrity on the part of an individual, for a nation is made up of an aggregation of individuals and the same rule of dealing prevails.

What did Congress do in this matter? In 1873 it passed an act authorizing the coinage of this trade-dollar. It put upon the statute-book a law which authorized the United States Treasury, through its mint, to coin these trade-dollars, and to give them out to be used in the lines of commerce and trade, not only by this nation but by the world at large. That law upon the statute-book was a contract on the part of this Government that when this currency was made and issued to the people it would be recognized and honored by the Government that created it, and when the people received this currency they received it under that contract, and it is obligatory on the part of the United States to carry out that contract in good faith.

I have heard it said, not in argument upon this floor but in private argument against this bill, and perhaps it may be also stated hereafter in argument in this discussion, that this particular coin was issued for the purposes of trade in a foreign country—China, I believe. I would like to ask what there is in the act itself authorizing the coinage of the trade-dollar that says that this coin was issued for trade with any other people than our own.

We must assume, and we can do so with perfect safety, that when a nation issues coin or currency of any kind it does so for purposes of trade and commerce with its own people and with no other, for its own people are obliged by law to take it. The people of other nations are not obliged to take it. It is said that in the discussion of the bill at the time it was before Congress for consideration and passage it was stated that this currency was for trade with China. I would ask, Mr. Speaker, in all fairness what the talk about a bill upon this floor before its passage has to do with it? Nothing whatever. What did the people know of the discussion that took place on the passage of this bill? Simply nothing.

The people who received this money look to the act itself upon the statute-book, and they have the right to look at that alone. That statute provided that this dollar should be coined with certain legends, marks, and words, and that then it should be a dollar; that it should pass into trade as a unit of exchange in carrying on the commercial transactions of our great nation and other peoples who saw fit to take it, and the contract on the part of the Government was that this dollar would be received back by the Government in payment of dues to it.

Now, why do I make this statement? Because under that act the Government compelled the people to receive this money, compelled them to take this dollar as a dollar, by saying in the act itself that it should be a legal tender for a certain amount. That was a guarantee on the part of the Government that this dollar was made in good faith; that it was the bona fide act of a responsible nation and an express guarantee in words that the Government, when the time came, would receive it as a dollar, as it ought to do. What rule is there in law or what principle is there in the great moral code that will allow a nation to make a solemn contract, a solemn pledge, and then break it? The United States received value for each of these dollars it allowed to go from its vaults. It received the value of a dollar for each one.

Now, under this contract (because it was a contract) the Government coined $16,000,000 of this money before any other legislative action was had in regard to it. But in 1876 a change came over the opinion of Congress—why, I am unable to say—but a change came over its opinion in regard to its policy concerning this dollar. After $16,000,000 of this coinage had been paid out, as we must assume, to our own people, Congress, in 1876, passed an act taking from this trade-dollar the legal-tender quality which belonged to it by the act authorizing its creation. I say that the Congress of the United States in passing this law of 1876, taking from this dollar its legal-tender function, committed a fraud upon all the people at least who had received this money.

This is strong language, but it is true. Why? Because at once upon the passage of that act of 1876 this coinage became merely bullion in the hands of the people; it would not pass from man to man in ordinary business. More than that; the Government did something which I am almost ashamed to state; the Government itself refused to accept this money. Congress, in the first place, passes an act making this dollar a legal tender, sending it out with all the insignia of the power and responsibility of the Government, and afterward coolly and advisedly says that this money should be worthless, so far as exchange among the people was concerned. I feel justified, therefore, in saying that Congress in the passage of the law of 1876 committed an act which was disgraceful to it and a fraud upon the people who had received this money. The Government of the United States made this dollar, and asserted it was a full dollar, and a unit of exchange, until it had passed from its hands to the hands of the people. The people had received it and paid for it its full face value, and then by this disgraceful act of 1876 it asserted by the power of might, and not by the power of right, that it was no longer a dollar, no longer a unit of exchange, no longer worthy of notice or consideration.

But some one will say, perhaps, in the course of this discussion that our own people did not receive this money; that it went abroad to China. Suppose it did; was it not a coin of the realm? Was it not a coin issued by the United States, and was it not entitled to be honored by redemption? This question can only be answered in the affirmative.

But it may be said—indeed my friend from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] has already substantially said by his question, "How do we know that all this coin which has gone to China and other nations will not come back, so that we shall be obliged to redeem it?" I say, let it come back. This is a coin of the realm, issued under the authority of the United States, and when it is presented at any of the counters of the United States Treasury the Government is, or ought to be, bound in honor and by the law of nations and the law of right to redeem it. I do not care if every dollar of this thirty-six millions comes back to the Government for redemption. It must redeem this money, or in the eyes of honest men of our own nation and of the world at large be forever disgraced.

Mr. CALKINS. Is the gentleman in favor of having this money recoined and put out again?

Mr. NUTTING. I will answer my friend from Indiana that I am in favor of the Government honoring this money. I am in favor of the United States being compelled to take back this dollar that it has made and passed to the people. I am in favor of the Government taking back the coin which it made and said was good, and which it afterward depreciated itself and then refused to take back. If we are to coin silver hereafter, then use this money when redeemed as bullion. If we are not to coin silver hereafter, then redeem it and sell it at its bullion value. The Government, by the act of 1876, made it mere bullion, and should not take advantage of its own wrong by refusing to receive it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is true that after the passage of the act of 1876 some $20,000,000 more of this coin was issued. But suppose we examine this question in the light of reason, in the light, if you please, of the principle of estoppel as recognized in law or in equity. Sixteen million dollars of this money had gone out to the people with the promise on the part of the Government by the act of 1873 that it would be treated as a coin of the realm and would be redeemed. The people had received this money in good faith; it had gone into all the avenues of trade in this and other lands. The people, having thus received it, had a right to believe that the portion of the coinage which came later was like that which preceded it, and would be honored by the Government as sacredly as that which had previously been coined. The $20,000,000 which was coined after the act of 1876, which took from this coin its legal-tender rights, was precisely in form, weight, material, and in appearance like that which had been issued while the law of 1873 was in force. It must follow that the people, having become used to this coin in the use of sixteen millions, had a right to believe that the twenty millions which was afterward coined and given to the people was of the same value.

Mr. CALKINS. If it does not interfere with my friend's argument I would like to ask him in what he would redeem this coin?

Mr. NUTTING. It should be redeemed for taxes. I assume the gentleman has too much of the sense of honor in him to say the Government may issue a dollar and say upon its face that it is a dollar, and refer not only to the authority of the Government but to an authority that is higher than that, and then refuse to redeem it.

Mr. CALKINS. But let me interrupt the gentleman. Let us not play upon words. Now, redeem it in what way? There is, I take it, but one way to redeem it, to wit, to recoin it; to redeem it in customs dues.

Mr. NUTTING. Take it back and recoin it. But I will answer that question of the gentleman as I proceed.

Mr. CHACE. If the gentleman will permit me I will say that the bill itself provides for that.

Mr. NUTTING. I will speak, since he calls attention to the recoining of this money, for a moment on that point. I find upon an examination of the authority that not only $36,000,000 were coined and placed in the markets of the world, but by the act of 1878 I find further that another fraud was committed upon this dollar and upon the people into whose hands it had gone. Why do I make that assertion? Because in the act of 1878 (and the gentleman [Mr. BLAND] who is the father of the bill may answer this)—by the act of 1878 the wording is so fixed that this dollar itself is still made disreputable and made no money at all. Why do I say that? Because the act says this dollar then coined and all other dollars of like fineness and weight shall be used by the people as a legal tender.

Why should Congress in the act of 1878 authorizing the coinage of the standard dollar, by saying that all dollars of like weight and fineness should be legal tender, discriminate against a dollar already coined and issued? This wording was intended to have the effect, and did have the effect, to disgrace the trade-dollar by reiterating the enactment of 1876 that the trade-dollar should no longer be a legal tender. See how fair, see how honest it was by the act of 1878 to authorize the coinage of the standard dollar with 412½ grains of silver and make it a legal tender, and in the same act still say that the trade-dollar, which has 420 grains of silver, should still continue mere bullion or inert silver in the hands of the people. This is honesty and fairness with a vengeance. It was substantially saying to those who had or might have the trade-dollar: "Congress understands that the trade-dollar is worth more in fact than the standard dollar, but we will make a law that the standard dollar shall be a legal tender, and you will be obliged to take it, though it has 7½ grains less silver in it than the trade-dollar, and will so fix the law that the trade-dollar shall still be disgraced, still be merely bullion, and at a discount. The people have the trade-dollar, and they may keep it."

I had always supposed, Mr. Speaker, that governments were to protect the people and the rights of the people. In fact the permanence of nationality depends upon the good faith and uprightness with which a nation deals with its subjects. Nations in the past have by dishonesty, unfairness, and the violation of the rules of good faith, time and time again, become shattered, broken, and ceased to exist.

A people who support and honor a government have a right to support and honor from it. There is no statute law which can compel a great nation like this to redeem its money pledges. But there is a law of immutable and unchanging justice that will surely punish a nation for the wrong it does. The principles of right and wrong obtain with nations precisely as with individuals. I say the people of a nation have a right to expect that the contracts of it will be kept as sacredly and performed as surely as the contracts of persons.

When Congress passes a law and it is found constitutional the people of these United States bow in submission. They without murmurings carry out in good faith the provisions of the law. In doing this the people rely on the Government to carry out honorably and fairly its promises to them.

The people have a right to expect, and do expect, that when the Government makes a law or commits an act it will hold itself ever ready to carry out its part of the transaction, not only in the letter but in the spirit of the transaction.

The right of coinage being exclusively in the Government, it must, under all the rules of human and divine law, be held to a strict and undeviating adherence to the performance of its obligations. If the rule here be elastic, then indeed are the people in danger. The trade-dollar was given the birthright of legal-tendership. It was given the form, features, and legends of the authority of these United States. It bears too on its body plain reference to our form of government. Not only does it have all these marks pointing to the power of this Government, but this money bears with it the words "In God we trust," thereby recognizing the highest and next to the highest power known to or recognized by an American.

The only thing that can be said against this coin is that it says too much. Perhaps, however, it was lucky that it gives notice that in God it trusts, for it seems those who have it must trust in God for its redemption unless this bill becomes a law.

The act of 1876 eliminating the legal-tender clause from this coinage act ought not, and in fact did not, debase this coin. What it did do, however, was to bring the coin under suspicion and disrepute. It was a vicious legislation, that had the effect of making its own token of trade, its own solemn act, disreputable. This act of 1876 had a tendency to, and did in fact, depreciate the market value of this coin.

The legislation of a government is not wise that brings into disrepute its own medium of commercial exchange.

We are, however, met with the argument that this coin has been absorbed by speculators. Is it true that a silver coin of the United States, issued within ten years, has by our own acts become so debased that it is possible for speculators to handle it as a foot-ball? If so, it is time for us to call a halt and inquire for the cause. Who is at fault for it? Why, Congress is at fault and no one else.

The act of 1876 eliminating the legal-tender clause cast suspicion on this coin and made it possible for speculators to cry it down and buy and cry it up and sell. Had it not been for this act of 1876 the trade-dollar would have been all through and even to-day a perfectly acceptable coin and in fact a popular coin.

It is not true that speculators have absorbed all this coin. Much of the 10,000,000 which is estimated to be in this country is held by the "hewers of wood and the drawers of water," together with the producers.

I, however, stand upon the broad principle, which I contend can not be shaken, that we must redeem this money in whosesoever hands we find it.

No matter how the holder has become possessed of it, as between the Government and the holder the Government must honor it. This is a money that passes by delivery, and the legal holder at least must be protected.

If a nation wishes to sink itself into the slums and wallows of contempt and dishonor with its own people and the people of civilized nations, it can do so no easier and quicker than by refusing to take and redeem its own coin issued under its own laws and customs.

It has been said that the Government of the United States would lose a large sum by redeeming and recoining these dollars into standard dollars as the bill provides. I deny that this is true. If the United States continues to coin the standard dollar it must purchase bullion for the purpose.

The trade-dollar is mere bullion now, and contains 7½ grains more bullion than the standard dollar. This excess of silver will pay the expense of recoinage and leave a profit of three-fourths of 1 per cent. on each dollar coined.

In proof of this assertion I will here read the letter of the Director of the Mint:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF THE MINT,
Washington, D. C., February 21, 1884.

SIR: Your letter of the 20th instant, asking what it would cost the Government to coin silver standard dollars outside of the cost of the metal used in the coinage, has been received; and in reply I have to inform you that the cost to coin silver dollars and subsidiary coin varies at the different mints. It is estimated in round numbers that the cost to coin standard dollars at the Philadelphia mint is $10 for a thousand pieces, at which rate the excess of bullion in the trade-dollar above the amount in the silver dollar would result in a net gain to the Government by the recoinage of the former into the latter of about three-quarters of 1 per cent. on the number of standard dollars thus coined.

Very respectfully,

HORATIO C. BURCHARD, Director.

Hon. N. W. NUTTING,
House of Representatives.

The Government ought not to ask to make a profit in order to induce Congress to pass a law to redeem this trade-dollar, but you can see that if it does redeem 10,000,000 of these dollars (and 10,000,000 is the highest amount said by Government officials to be likely to come in on the passage of this law), these 10,000,000 can be coined into 10,000,000 Bland standard dollars, and the Government will make a net profit of $75,000 by the operation.

The fourth section of this act I hear excites the antagonism of the friends of the Bland standard dollar. This section provides—

That the trade-dollars so received at the coinage mints shall be regarded and treated as silver bullion, and, at their bullion value, shall be deducted from the amount of bullion required to be purchased and coined by the act of February 28, 1878.

There ought to be no trouble about this section whatever. The law of 1878 provides as follows:

* * * And the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to purchase from time to time silver bullion at the market price thereof, not less than two million dollars' worth per month, * * * and cause the same to be coined monthly, as fast as so purchased, into such dollars (standard dollars).

Now, why should the friends of silver currency, and especially the friends of the standard dollar, find fault with this section? The trade-dollar is bullion and nothing else. It has ceased to be currency. Why should not the trade-dollar bullion be purchased as well as any other silver bullion? I can see no reason why it should not be purchased as bullion and used to satisfy the act of 1878 in regard to the purchases of silver for coinage. The trade-dollar, even though it is mere bullion, has some claims on the United States, for the United States made it and then debased it by its own act, and now ought to take care of it.

I think it would be well when the trade-dollar is redeemed and coined into standard dollars that the coinage of silver dollars cease, at least until there is a call for these dollars which will use up what is on hand now. Let us look at this for a few moments and see on what I base my judgment in this regard.

Standard dollars were coined after the act of February 28, 1878, up to November 1, 1879, to the number of 45,206,200; and on November 1, 1879, there was in circulation of these dollars 13,002,842, leaving in the Treasury vaults November 1, 1879, 32,203,358. Here was a purchase of silver and coinage of 32,203,358 more dollars than the country wanted.

There were coined of these standard dollars to November 1, 1880, 72,847,750, and on November 1, 1880, there were in the Treasury vaults 47,084,450. At this date there was an overcoinage of 47,084,450.

To November 1, 1883, there had been coined of these standard dollars 156,720,949; of this sum there was in the Treasury vaults on the last-named date $116,386,017 of this money. It is true that of this $116,386,017 in the Treasury there were silver certificates out representing about 90,000,000 of these dollars, but these silver certificates are only redeemable in the silver dollars and are not in any sense the money of the merchant, but can only be used within our own country.

Why this purchase of 5,240 tons of silver to coin the standard dollar when the most of it stays in the vaults of the Treasury? Is it to make a market for silver for the benefit of the silver kings and silver monopolists? This seems to be the case at least to the extent of the silver dollars which stay in the Treasury.

The present system of the production of silver by mining is only within the ability of great wealth. Mines can only be worked and carried on by rich men. It is a grand industry, but it is not situated now in its workings so that Congress is authorized to continue the coinage of standard dollars, when more have been coined already than the commerce and trade of our country demand. The law of 1878 compelling the Government to purchase two millions' worth of silver monthly and to coin that monthly into silver has become a law in the interest of silver bullionists. If you are to make a law compelling Congress to purchase silver in order to make a market for the profit of silver kings then do that boldly, and not put it under the guise of coinage necessity, for that has ceased.

America is not the only country that is a market for silver. It has a market in all or most of the countries of the world; so that Congress has no more right to create by law a market for silver than it has for any other product of this country. It is really legislation toward centralization of riches and the money power. It is really legislating in favor of monopoly. But let me say, if we are to be obliged to continue the purchase of silver, in the name of common sense let it remain bars as it comes from the mines and put it in the Treasury in that form, and not be to the expense of coining it into dollars when the dollars are not needed.

I am glad to see money in the Treasury in large sums, and I am not one that desires because we have large sums in the Treasury to be extravagant in appropriations. What are we talking about when we say the Treasury is full and overflowing? Is it not true that the United States has a debt of more than $1,500,000,000? The surplus in the Treasury is a mere item in comparison with what we owe. Let us be careful how we appropriate money; let us reserve our monetary ability until our debt is discharged. I am one that believes in paying the national debt, and that, too, as soon as we can. I do not believe that a man who owes $1,000 in honest debts, even though he has $200 in his pocket, has a right to say he is rich and can spend money extravagantly. The money he has in his pocket is not his; it is his creditor's; and the same principle prevails with this Government in regard to its so-called full Treasury and its immense debt.

Is the policy of the United States in regard to its debt to be what it is said the policy of England is—the debt to stand forever and pay the interest on it? I have heard this kind of talk in Congress, but I say it is a kind of repudiation. It is a way of saying we will never pay the principal, but we will go on perpetually taxing this and coming generations to pay the interest. This is not honest nor is it safe. Legislate away from centralization. Legislate above monopoly. Legislate for all the people, and not a few.

I do not wish this country to follow the example set by England as to its national debt, which has grown from £664,236 in the time of the great revolution in 1689, to £824,607,459 in 1861, or about $4,000,000,000.

A great national debt is a great curse and a great burden for the people, and the burden should be made to grow small as the years go on, and not greater.

The landed question in England is also like that in regard to her national debt. The great English debt is owing and must be paid if at all by the money of the people. But the debt is held by the few—by the rich. It is so with the lands also; a few own the lands, and while the many, the people, want them, they are not obtainable.

In this, too, the American people are gradually coming to the English idea. Great landed estates are fast growing in number, and it is an alarming thing to see. It is all the more alarming because these great land purchases have been made possible by the negligence of Congress if not by its crime. And it is all the more alarming that these great landed estates are being created because many of them are owned by the citizens of England. It would not be alarming that foreigners buy and own our lands in small tracts, but when large territories are purchased it is time to think and stop if we can. For instance, the following purchases of lands in this country have been made by foreigners not citizens within a little time:

|---|---|
| English syndicate No. 1 (in Texas) | 4,500,000 |
| English syndicate No. 3 (in Texas) | 3,000,000 |
| Sir Edward Reid, K. C. B. (in Florida) | 2,000,000 |
| English syndicate, headed by S. Philpotts | 1,800,000 |

| Missouri Land and L. S. Company, of Edinburgh, Scotland | 165,000 |
| English syndicate (in Florida) | 59,000 |
| Total acres | 20,941,666 |

Who does not look at this list and tremble for the future? By this it will be seen that subjects of the British Empire in only thirty-two different tracts own 20,000,000 acres of our land, a tract almost two-thirds as large as the island of England, which contains about 32,500,000 acres. It is a tract as large almost as the State of New York, which has about 23,000,000 acres. It is a tract as large as the States of Connecticut, Delaware, Maryland, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire. It is equal to a strip ten miles wide from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast. This kind of thing tends to centralization. It tends toward the condition of Ireland.

Then, in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me say that we should stop legislating in favor of silver monopoly. We should carefully manage the affairs of the nation so our national debt will be paid and not be handed down to future generations as a burden. We should, so far as we can, stop and cause to be stopped the absorption of our lands by foreigners, and we should guard and protect our honor by passing this bill now, and thereby redeem the nation's pledge to its people that its currency was to be cared for and protected at all times.

Mr. DOWD. Mr. Speaker, four speeches have been made in favor of this bill, and there seems to be nobody in opposition to it.

Mr. BRUMM. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. DOWD. No member of the committee. And I give notice now that at the end of five minutes, unless some member of the committee takes the floor against the bill, I shall move the previous question. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS].

Mr. MILLS. I wish to offer an amendment to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield for an amendment?

Mr. DOWD. I have no authority to do that.

The SPEAKER. The amendment can be read for information, and unless the previous question is sustained of course it may be offered hereafter.

Mr. MILLS. Then I ask that the amendment be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "but," in the fourth line of the third section, and insert:

"Together with all other silver hereafter purchased by the Secretary of the Treasury for coinage, shall be coined into half-dollars, each of which shall contain 206¼ grains of standard silver; and all of said coins shall be a legal tender to any amount for all debts, public and private: Provided, That the Secretary may, whenever he thinks proper, continue under existing law the coinage of quarters and dimes, but they shall contain one-fourth and one-tenth of the standard silver now contained in the standard silver dollar, and be a full legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private."

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, it is proper that the Government should control all money that circulates among its people, and all moneys that circulate among a people to effect exchanges ought to be of the same value. The dollar, whether it be gold or silver or a paper dollar, ought to be of identically the same value. But in addition to that the smaller coins of lesser denomination than a dollar which circulate among the people ought to be so ordered by the Government as to serve the purposes of convenience and at the same time retain a proportionate value.

Now, the amendment I have offered looks to that end. Instead of coining the denomination of dollars as provided by the act of 1878, I provide by this amendment that these standard dollars which are provided by this bill to be taken up and coined into standard silver dollars, as well as all other silver money hereafter to be coined by the mints, shall be in half-dollars, quarters, and dimes. I provide that they, like the standard silver dollar, shall be of full standard value, which they are not now, and be made a full legal-tender. The only question is this: Will you continue to coin the standard dollar or will you at once begin to coin the standard half-dollars and smaller coins? And that is all there is of it. It amounts precisely to the coinage of the same value of silver, but it makes the more convenient divisions and denominations of halves, quarters, and dimes, instead of dollars.

Now, the dollar was never coined to any considerable extent by our Government until we commenced to recoin the silver in 1878, and this Government has begun to take a proper consideration of that question.

From the foundation of the Government till 1878, if I am not greatly mistaken—I have not looked at the figures recently—over one hundred millions of silver were coined and kept in circulation, while only eight millions of silver dollars had been coined. Why was that so? Because the silver dollar was not a convenient coin and the two halves were more convenient than the one dollar. Until 1853 it was found that our coin was going out of the country, or it was believed that it was leaving us. In 1852 or 1853 the coin was debased, and then the legal-tender quality was taken from it. But there is no reason why that state of things should exist now. There is no reason why the half-dollars and quarters and dimes should have any less amount of standard silver in them than the dollar itself has. This was only done in 1853 to prevent the exportation of our silver, which was then at a premium.

The half-dollars up to that time were of full standard and legal-tender, and they were debased to keep them at home, because we had no other money and could not afford to let them go abroad.

Silver was more valuable relatively than gold in 1853. But there is no reason now why we should not give the people of the United States a more convenient circulation than the standard dollar gives them. The two halves are more convenient than one dollar, and the only objection to coining two halves instead of one dollar is that the halves are not full standard, and the dollar is. The answer to that is, make the halves full standard and then coin the same number of halves that you do dollars—two halves for every one dollar of your coinage. But this does not prevent the coinage by the Secretary of the Treasury for minor circulation of quarters and dimes, but provides also the quarter shall be full standard and have one-fourth of the standard silver that is in the standard dollar, and the dime shall be full standard and have one-tenth of the standard silver that is in the standard dollar, and that all shall be full legal-tender for all purposes. There will be only a limited amount of these fractional coins coined under the superintendence of the Secretary of the Treasury for purposes of change.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. DOWD. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has twenty-five minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. DOWD. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. BLAND was recognized.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] to yield to me, that I may make a motion to adjourn. It is near our usual time for adjournment.

Mr. BLAND. I am not feeling very well and will yield for that motion.

Mr. SMITH. Will the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] in the first place yield to me to offer a substitute, that it may be read for the information of the House?

Mr. BLAND. I yield for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the proposed substitute will be read for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act to redeem the trade-dollar and to suspend the coinage of trade and standard silver dollars.

Be it enacted, &c., That until January 1, 1886, United States trade-dollars shall be received at their face value in payment of all Government dues and shall not be again paid out or in any other manner issued; and the holder of trade-dollars, on presentation of the same at the office of the Treasurer or assistant treasurer, or any mint of the United States, shall receive in exchange for the same, dollar for dollar, at his or her option, either standard silver dollars or United States fractional silver coin; and the trade-dollar so received shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, when necessary, be coined into fractional silver coin.

SEC. 2. That all laws authorizing the coinage of trade-dollars or the purchase of silver and its coinage in silver standard dollars be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. BLAND. Several gentlemen desire to have amendments read for information, to be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. CASSIDY. I desire to give notice that at the proper time I will move to strike out the fourth section of the bill.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the Chair suggests that gentlemen who desire to offer amendments may send them up and they will be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Under the leave granted by the House the following proposed amendments were handed in.

Substitute to be proposed by Mr. POLAND:

That all silver dollars heretofore coined at the mints of the United States under and according to the provisions of an act of Congress passed February 12, 1873, and known and called trade-dollars, not chopped, defaced, or otherwise mutilated, shall hereafter be a legal tender at their nominal value for all debts and dues, public and private, except where otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract.

SEC. 2. That there shall be no further coinage of silver dollars at the mints of the United States under the provisions of said act of February 12, 1873.

Amendment to be proposed by Mr. WEILER:

Amend section 4, as follows:

"Provided, however, That the Secretary of the Treasury and all officials of the Government shall in all cases receive other silver bullion suitable for coinage purposes in the stead of trade-dollars to the extent of all requirements under existing law when offered at less price than said trade-dollars are."

Amendment to be proposed by Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois:

In section 1, line 4, after the words "trade-dollars," insert the words "not chopped, defaced, or otherwise mutilated."

Amendment to be proposed by Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois:

Section 4, line 3, after the words "bullion value," insert the words "at the date of their receipt at the coinage mints."

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MAXEY introduced a bill (S. 1947) to authorize the appointment of a commission by the President of the United States to run and mark the boundary lines between a portion of the Indian Territory and the State of Texas, in connection with a similar commission to be appointed by the State of Texas; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. BROWN introduced a bill (S. 1948) to require the payment in cash to the State of Georgia of $35,555.42 appropriated for said State by "an act to refund to the State of Georgia certain money expended by said State for the common defense in 1777," approved March 3, 1883; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BROWN. This was an appropriation that was made at the last session of Congress to refund this amount to the State of Georgia; and the Comptroller of the Treasury decided that it could not be paid, on account of the condition of the books, the direct tax or war tax standing charged to the State. The object of this bill is to direct that the will of Congress be carried out, notwithstanding the decision of the Comptroller. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MORGAN. Before the bill is referred I beg to say——

Mr. HOAR. The original bill came from the Committee on Claims, did it not?

Mr. MORGAN. Several States in the South are concerned in this proposed measure; and I hope the Judiciary Committee or whatever committee takes charge of this bill will report as a substitute for it a general bill on the subject to get rid of the unwise and unnecessary decision of the Department which obstructs the accounts of States with the Federal Government.

Mr. HOAR. Of course every bill of this kind which does not belong to it blocks the docket of the Judiciary Committee, which is usually supplied with plenty of work on matters involving law questions and constitutional questions proper. As the measure that this bill amends came from the Committee on Claims, it seems to me this bill should go there.

Mr. BROWN. It came originally from the Committee on Claims, but was acted upon by and met the approval of Congress, and the bill was enacted into a law. Now the question comes up whether the money shall be paid or whether the decision of the Comptroller shall stand. It seems to me that is more appropriately a question for the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. HOAR. The Committee on Claims reported a bill, and I believe put on it the same conditions which the Senate had on the bill which passed yesterday, that any debt which should be due from the State of Georgia should be credited, did it not?

Mr. BROWN. It is a question whether the direct tax known as the war tax is properly charged against the State of Georgia and is a subject of set-off against a claim of this kind.

Mr. HOAR. We had that up yesterday.

Mr. BROWN. The Senate had the same question up yesterday. This was an appropriation made at the last session of Congress by both Houses and signed by the President, and the bill is simply carrying out the decision of yesterday and asking Congress to instruct—for that is the effect of the bill—the Secretary of the Treasury to pay over the money as directed by the law.

Mr. HOAR. Why should a matter the policy of which has been submitted to the Committee on Claims in two bills be now taken from that committee and sent to another committee?

Mr. BROWN. The bill of yesterday was passed and has gone to the House. A similar bill passed both Houses at the last session, but the money is withheld, and the object of the present bill is to instruct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay over the money that was appropriated by the act of last year.

Mr. HOAR. But does not this bill go a little further? Does it not intend to instruct the Treasury to pay over the money whether there is any debt due by the State of Georgia, war tax or no war tax?

Mr. BROWN. I am perfectly willing that it shall be amended so as to say that any other debt shall go as a set-off, but in fact there is none.

Mr. HOAR. But my point is why the Committee on Claims, having considered this subject twice and having made a report favorable to the Senator and favorable to the view which the Senate unanimously adopted yesterday, should not consider this bill which is to correct what is called a mistake of the accounting officers in carrying out the policy enacted by a bill reported by that committee. Why should it be sent to another committee?

Mr. BROWN. I asked that it should be referred to the Judiciary Committee because it was a legal question, and I thought more properly went before that committee; but I have no objection to the other reference.

Mr. HOAR. The bill of last year excepted all debts, as I understand. Now the Senator proposes, I understand, to pass the bill in a shape which relieves it not merely from any erroneous construction of the Treasury Department calling the war tax a debt, but from all debts. The Senator does not propose to apply it to all the Southern States, but he proposes to go further than that and relieve it from any other debt, if other debt there be.

Mr. BROWN. The fact is there is none other charged on the books of the Treasury; but I have no objection out of abundant caution to having such an amendment to this bill by the committee or the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. I move to amend the reference by sending it to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BROWN. I have no objection to its going to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORGAN. If it takes that reference I hope the Committee on Claims will consider the general subject and not confine this merely to the claim of Georgia. I have as much confidence in that committee and its ability as any committee of this Senate, and they are quite as able to handle this question as any committee. I should like very much if the committee when they bring back the bill would make it applicable to the entire subject and settle the question.

Mr. HOAR. What is the general subject?

Mr. MORGAN. Whether the war tax of the Southern States shall be a set-off against the demands which may inure to the respective States by the Government of the United States. It was discussed yesterday whether the law imposing the direct tax is obligatory upon those States that have not accepted it and provided for its collection from the people of the respective States.

Mr. HOAR. It does not seem to me that that subject ought to be dealt with by any committee in reference to this bill. The policy which the Senate established yesterday was that they would not compel the State of Georgia to pay her war tax by setting it off against a claim otherwise equitable due to her from the Treasury, while they were not enforcing by any method that war tax against the other States. That was as far as the Senate went. That question properly arose in considering the particular claim of Georgia. But the question whether the war tax amount should be kept as it is on the books subject to the future discretion of Congress, or whether it should be remitted or wiped out, is a question which would seem to me to come up entirely by itself and without reference at all to what we do with this debt of the State of Georgia; and it does not seem to me that that is a question which belongs either to the Committee on Claims that deals with claims against the Government, or to the Committee on the Judiciary that deals with the mechanism for administering and enforcing general laws, and that the true way for the Senator is to introduce a bill and send it to the Committee on Finance. There is where that matter belongs.

Mr. MORGAN. I was indicating in a very general way my views about the duty of the committee to which this bill might be referred. What I desire to reach is this: that the amounts of money that may be coming to the States, for instance from the sale of the public lands, for the purchase of arms, munitions, &c., that under the existing laws are to be accounted for to the States and to be distributed among the States, shall not be set off on the books of the Treasury against the war tax chargeable against the Southern States. Georgia asks that in the bill which is now presented, and I merely desire that if action of that kind should be taken in reference to the case of Georgia it should apply equally to all the other Southern States.

I do not care to have Congress declare that that debt was unjust or unconstitutional or void, or that the law should be repealed; but whatever action is taken in reference to one of the Southern States Congress would of course be disposed to take in reference to all of them. It should make no discrimination between them. There is no ground for any discrimination. I merely desired that the committee should take into consideration the whole subject, and should prepare a bill under which the decision of the First Comptroller of the Treasury should be reversed. It is not founded in law, as was remarked yesterday by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] who now occupies the chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BROWN. I will make this additional remark. If my friend from Alabama desires that question brought up I prefer that he should introduce an original resolution on the subject, and not connect it with this bill, as the appropriation has already been made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair). The bill is referred to the Committee on Claims.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. GROOME, it was Ordered, That C. D Hill have leave, subject to the rules, to withdraw his papers from the files of the Senate.

PROTECTION OF THE PUBLIC DOMAIN.

Mr. VAN WYCK submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to furnish the Senate copies of correspondence between the Departments of Justice and Interior as to the present efficacy of the statute of March 3, 1807, empowering the President to direct marshals and employ such military force as may be necessary to remove certain persons and obstructions from the public domain.

WAR TAX OF 1861.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair, pursuant to the rule, lays before the Senate a resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

The resolution was read and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to advise the Senate what amount of the war tax of 1861 is due and unpaid, from what States, or from the citizens of what States due; whether any portion of said tax, and, if so, what portion, has been paid by withholding money due to any State or States from the General Government, and whether the rule adopted in withholding such money has been applied alike to all the States.

JOHN FLETCHER.

Mr. HARRISON. The bill (S. 542) for the relief of John Fletcher was reported adversely on the 17th of March by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON], from the Committee on Claims. There are some papers connected with the case that were mislaid and did not get to the committee, I think, in time for consideration before the report was made. I ask that the order indefinitely postponing the bill may be set aside by consent, and the bill recommitted, with the papers, to the Committee on Claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the vote of the Senate heretofore had indefinitely postponing the bill named by him be reconsidered and that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Claims. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PATENT-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. PLATT. I introduced on Monday last, the 24th instant, a bill (S. 1924) providing for the organization of the Patent Office into an independent Department, and for giving it the exclusive control of the building known as the Patent Office and of the fund pertaining to that office, and the bill was laid upon the table to enable me to make some remarks upon it before it should be referred to the appropriate committee. I wish to say that I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate at the conclusion of the morning business on Monday next to listen to some remarks that I shall make upon that bill.

LADY FRANKLIN BAY EXPEDITION.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I move to take up the bill (S. 1871) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to offer a reward of $25,000 for rescuing or ascertaining the fate of the Greely expedition, which was reported yesterday from the Committee on Naval Affairs. If we are going to do anything in relation to this matter it ought to be done at once. I hope the Senate will take up the bill now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from California to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the bill?

Mr. HOAR. Let the bill be read for information. That will answer for the reading when it is taken up.

The Chief Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to make proclamation immediately, and cause said proclamation to be published and distributed as thoroughly as may be in such foreign ports as are interested in navigation and traffic in the Arctic seas, that the Government of the United States will pay a reward of $25,000, to be equitably paid or distributed, to such ship or ships, person or persons, not in the military or naval service of the United States, as shall discover and rescue or satisfactorily ascertain the fate of the Greely expedition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Naval Affairs report an amendment, which will be read for information.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the bill:

But such proclamation shall not be made in terms that will involve the United States in any future liability or responsibility beyond said reward, or will induce unprepared vessels to incur extraordinary peril or risk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate now consider the bill?

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As the bill has just been read at length, if there be no objection the Chair will regard that as a reading as in Committee of the Whole. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me there ought to be some provision in the bill either that the Secretary of the Navy shall have the final determination as an arbitrator or referee to determine whether any person is entitled to this reward, or if more than one person to distribute it among them, or else that there should be provision for a judicial proceeding in the Court of Claims. The bill, if I understood it correctly when it was read, provides not merely that the persons who shall rescue the expedition but persons who shall ascertain their fate shall be entitled to this reward. It is quite probable, therefore, especially under the latter clause, that there will be a good many claimants, which would give rise to dispute.

Mr. MILLER, of California. The Senator will notice that by the language of the bill it is to be equitably distributed.

Mr. HOAR. Who is to do it?

Mr. MILLER, of California. The Secretary of the Navy. That is the intention of the bill. I think the language means that, or if it does not, if the Senator will suggest an amendment we shall be glad to accept it.

Mr. HALE. I suggest to put in the words "under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy."

Mr. HOAR. It ought to be a little more emphatic.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Will the Senator suggest an amendment?

Mr. HOAR. I move to add to the bill:

And the determination of the Secretary of the Navy as to the right of any person to said reward, or a share thereof, shall be conclusive upon all persons.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. CONGER. Let the bill be read as amended.

The Chief Clerk read the bill as amended.

The amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 1847) to authorize the issuing of a register to John S. McQuin and J. Warren Wonson for the schooner Druid; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

FLORIDA INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar under the eighth rule is now in order, and will be proceeded with.

The bill (S. 230) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to settle the claim of the State of Florida on account of expenditures made in suppressing Indian hostilities was announced as first in order on the Calendar.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to hear the report read.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. HAMPTON February 5, 1884.

Mr. HAMPTON. I asked yesterday that the bill might be postponed until the return of the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES], and it was passed over without prejudice, retaining its place on the Calendar. I understood that to be agreed to yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over to retain its place at the head of the Calendar under Rule VIII on account of the absence of one of the Senators from Florida. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

UNLADING OF BULKY MERCHANDISE.

The bill (S. 848) to amend section 2776 of the Revised Statutes of the United States so as to authorize the unlading of coal, salt, railroad iron, and other like articles in bulk, under the superintendence of customs officers, at the expense of parties interested, at places to be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury within the collection district, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GARLAND. Does no report or statement accompany the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair). There is no report.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] will probably explain the meaning of the bill. There is no printed report.

Mr. DOLPH. I shall be glad to do so. Before doing so, however, I ask to have a letter from the honorable Secretary of the Treasury read, in regard to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter from the Secretary of the Treasury will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 5, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 17th ultimo, inclosing Senate bills 700, 815, and 848 (herewith returned), and requesting my views as to whether the relief sought to be obtained by bills 700 and 815 (to extend the limits of the ports of Portland, Oreg., and New Orleans, La., respectively) would not be secured by the passage of bill No. 848, which provides for the unlading of vessels at places to be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury within a customs collection district.

In reply I have to say that in my opinion the passage of the bill would not only accomplish the object desired as to the particular districts mentioned in the two bills first named, but would prove a convenience generally. I therefore recommend its passage.

Very respectfully,

CHAS. J. FOLGER, Secretary.

HON. JOHN P. JONES,
United States Senate.

Mr. DOLPH. I also ask the Secretary to read the section of the Revised Statutes referred to, although it is not necessary to an explanation of the bill.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2776. Any vessel may proceed with any merchandise brought in her, and, in the manifest delivered to the collector of the customs, reported as destined for any foreign port, from the district within which such vessel shall first arrive to such foreign port without paying or securing the payment of any duties upon such merchandise as shall be actually re-exported in the vessel. But the manifest so declaring to re-export such merchandise shall be delivered to such collector within forty-eight hours after the arrival of the vessel. And the master of such vessel shall give bond as required by the next section.

Mr. DOLPH. The growth of various cities which have been heretofore made ports of entry in the United States has been such since those cities were made ports of entry as to require some relief, either by an extension of the boundaries of the ports of entry or by some such provision as is contained in the bill. Early in the session I introduced a bill to enlarge the limits of the port of Portland as a port of entry. A similar bill was introduced to enlarge the limits of the port of entry at the port of New Orleans. This bill is intended to take the place of those bills and meet the difficulty everywhere by allowing certain articles only to be discharged in the immediate neighborhood of ports of entry under the supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury and at the cost of the parties interested.

It is intended to place beyond question the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to permit vessels arriving at a port of entry in the United States laden with coal, salt, railroad iron, and other like articles in bulk to proceed to and be discharged at other places within the collection district when the circumstances are such as in his judgment warrant it. The necessity of the proposed amendment arises out of the doubts which are entertained by the Department as to whether under a strict construction of the present law such permits are authorized.

As a matter of fact the necessities of commerce have in many instances been recognized by the custom-house officials with the acquiescence of the Department, and the unlading of articles of the character mentioned in the bill at places without the limits of the port of entry, but within the collector's district, in cases where the United States would not be put to additional expense or trouble, has been permitted.

The bill is approved by the Treasury Department. Its propriety, it appears to me, can not be questioned. The additional expense of superintending the unlading of vessels under such permits is by the terms of the bill to be borne by the parties interested. It ought not to be the policy of the Government in the collection of the duties laid by law upon imported merchandise to use the machinery provided for its collection for the purpose of imposing additional burdens upon the importer.

Many sections are interested in this bill. To illustrate: I was told when I applied at the Treasury Department for a permit of the character mentioned that in the State of Florida a case had arisen where a permit had been granted to unload cocoa-nut seeds without the port of entry for certain reasons which made it impracticable to have them reshipped. In the district of California it has become a necessity of commerce to allow bulky articles, such as railroad iron, salt, and coal, to be unladen across the bay at the city of Oakland under the supervision of the collector of the port of San Francisco, and at the expense of the parties interested. At the city of Portland the port of entry is at Portland, upon the west side of the river, but railroads have recently been built whose present termini were on the eastern side of the river. Consequently it is a great convenience to have railroad iron, for instance, discharged on the opposite side of the river rather than require it to be discharged at the port of entry on the west side of the river and then transshipped. So in the State of Minnesota, as I understand from the chairman of the Committee on Commerce [Mr. MCMILLAN], there is a similar case, and I presume there are cases of the kind in every collection district.

I believe there is no objection to the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PETER K. DEDERICK.

The bill (S. 1019) for the relief of Peter K. Dederick was announced as next in order.

Mr. PLUMB. I object to the consideration of that bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill, being objected to, will take its place under Rule IX.

METROPOLITAN POLICE FORCE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1432) for the relief of the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia.

It provides for the payment to each of such persons, or their legal representatives, who were officers, clerks, and employés of the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia on the 28th of February, 1867, a sum equal to 20 per cent. on the salary of such persons as fixed by law for the time stated in the resolution of the 28th of February, 1867.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report in that case be read, if there is one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a report; it will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. VANCE February 7, 1884:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the petition of the members of the police force of the District of Columbia who were in office during the year 1867, claiming the amounts due them under the joint resolution of Congress approved February 28, 1867, have duly considered the same, and make the following report:

The claim of the Metropolitan police force to the benefits of the joint resolution of February 28, 1867, were favorably reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia during the first session of the Forty-third Congress, and again during the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress. The Senate Committee on Claims also reported a bill for the relief of these claimants (S. 319) during the second session of the Forty-fifth Congress, which passed the Senate April 25, 1878.

The facts in the case are so fully set forth in the report of the Committee on Claims that the committee adopt it and make it part of this report, namely:

"[Senate Report No. 234, Forty-fifth Congress, second session.]

"Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following report (to accompany bill S. 319):

"The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred a bill (S. 319) for the relief of the Metropolitan police force, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

"The bill was before the Senate in the first session of the Forty-third Congress, on the favorable report of the Committee on the District of Columbia. Referring to the joint resolution approved February 28, 1867, granting an increase of the salaries of certain employés of the Government, the committee in their report say:

"'They find by the terms of said resolution that the sum of 20 per cent. additional compensation on their respective salaries as fixed by law, or where no salary is fixed by law on their pay respectively, was to be allowed and paid to the following-described persons, now employed in the civil service of the United States at Washington, as follows: To civil officers, temporary and all other clerks, messengers, and watchmen, including enlisted men detailed as such; employés, male and female, of the Executive Mansion; and in any of the following-named Departments or any bureau or division thereof, to wit: State, Treasury, War, Navy, Interior, Post-Office, Attorney-General, Agricultural, &c.

"'Many persons embraced in the above resolution, and among the number the Metropolitan police force of the city of Washington, made application for their additional compensation and were refused, under the ruling of the First Comptroller, upon the ground that they were not among the persons described in the resolution entitled to the additional 20 per cent.

"'The parties interested, with the exception of the Metropolitan police force, brought suit for their respective claims before the Court of Claims, and obtained judgments against the United States. The counsel for the Government appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, which tribunal has confirmed the decision of the Court of Claims.

"'The counsel for the Metropolitan police force advised them not to bring suit, but to await the decision in the cases already taken up, as they were test cases and would decide the case of the force. When the cases referred to had been decided it was too late for them to sue in the Court of Claims, and the Comptroller refused to entertain their claim again on the ground that the resolution of February 28, 1867, had been repealed by the act of July 12, 1870.

"'The case of Charles N. Manning, guard or watchman of the jail, was decided in his favor by the Court of Claims, and that decision was confirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States. The Supreme Court decided that as the guards and watchmen of the jail are appointed by the warden, who is required to report to the Secretary of the Interior, and as the Secretary of the Interior fixes the salaries of the guards and watchmen, they belong to a bureau or division of the Interior Department.

"'By the act of August 6, 1861, a board of police commissioners are appointed in the same manner that the warden of the jail is, and this board appoint the police force precisely as the warden appointed the guards and watchmen of the jail.

"'The board of commissioners are by the same act required to report to the Secretary of the Interior annually the condition of the police force.

"'Annual estimates of appropriations are required by the Secretary of the Interior for the force, and returns are made to him. All requisitions for money for printing and supervising legal opinions are made through him. Charges made against members of the board of police are investigated by him; applications for the appointment to the office are filed with him, and the nominations are made by him, and all communications to Congress and the Executive are made through him, and payment to the board and force of salaries is made through him.

"'Attorney-General Bates, in an opinion addressed to Hon. Caleb B. Smith, Secretary of the Interior, decided that it was the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to cause the oath of allegiance to be administered to the board of police and that they are connected with the Department of the Interior.

"'All the decisions of the Attorney-General relative to the board of commissioners have been addressed to the Secretary of the Interior.

"'The Metropolitan force has been published in the Blue-Book as connected with the Department of the Interior until it was transferred to the Department of Justice.

"'It is evident that the Metropolitan police force of Washington was a bureau or division of the Department of the Interior at the time that the Comptroller refused them the additional compensation allowed by the joint resolution of February 28, 1867. In view of that fact, the committee recommend that said force be allowed to sue the United States in the Court of Claims for the 20 per cent. claimed by them under the resolution aforesaid, and recommend the passage of the bill (S. 304) already reported.'

"The 20 per cent. cases, 13 Wallace, 568, are the authorities referred to in support of the foregoing report, and they seem to sustain the claim fully.

"Your committee report back the bill, and recommend its passage."

The committee find, in addition to the facts stated in the report of the Committee on Claims, that in the annual report of the Secretary of the Interior for the year 1868 he includes the police force as a bureau or division of his Department. The force is also included in his salary estimate to Congress for that year for the Interior Department, and Congress appropriated the funds to pay the force on that estimate.

There is no doubt in the minds of the committee as to the force being entitled to the benefit of the joint resolution. By law and by usage they were a part of the Interior Department at that time.

The police force filed their claims in the Treasury shortly after the law was passed, but the settlement was postponed from time to time on account of several points of law raised against them in parallel cases, which points went to the Supreme Court in test cases as each was raised, and each case was decided in favor of the claimants. These points were raised consecutively, thus causing the long delay; the claims of the force continued pending in the Department in the mean while. The last of these 20 per cent. cases are reported in 20 Wallace, S. C. Reports. When these decisions were announced the claimants again applied to the Treasury for payment, but were again denied, on the ground then that the appropriation had been covered into the Treasury and was not available.

Your committee report a similar bill to the one that passed the Senate on report of the Committee on Claims, and recommend its passage.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NEWPORT NEWS.

The bill (S. 1149) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONGER. The object of this bill is to amend the statutes in relation to the immediate transportation of dutiable goods, chapter 190 of the Revised Code, by inserting "Newport News" in the first section and in the seventh section among the names of ports of entry from which goods may be transported in bond, "immediate transportation," as it is called, and to which they may be transported. The port of Newport News has been made a port of entry since the law of 1880 was passed, and this is to give that port of entry the same privileges with other ports of the United States. It is recommended by the Committee on Commerce.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN G. ROSE.

The bill (S. 717) for the relief of John G. Rose was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. The last clause of that bill seems to be very remarkable. It reads:

And that the Secretary of the Navy be authorized and directed to restore the said John G. Rose to the place in the list of lieutenant-commanders of the Navy to which he would be entitled by regular course of promotion.

I object to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is adversely reported.

Mr. HOAR. Why may it not be disposed of?

Mr. HALE. The report is adverse.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then let it be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HALE. That should be done.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

TAX ON ROPE AND BAGGING.

The bill (S. 453) for the relief of Coronna, Taussig & Co. and others was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the examination and settlement of a number of specified claims for tax on rope and bagging alleged to have been illegally assessed and collected upon the separate application of the parties named.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. MANDERSON February 7, 1884:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 453) for the relief of Coronna, Taussig & Co. and others, having had the same under consideration, respectfully report:

The claim of these applicants for relief came before the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives at the third session of the Forty-sixth Congress and the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress. Upon both occasions the said committees reported favorably in about the following language:

"The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3874) for the relief of Coronna, Taussig & Co. and others, having had the same under consideration, respectfully report:

"That all said cases present the same questions for consideration and pray for the same relief. It appears that under the internal-revenue laws, prior to the act of July 13, 1866, no special provision was made for ascertaining the weight of cotton, and in many collection districts the tax was collected on the gross weight, including the bagging and rope, while in New Orleans and many other places an allowance of twenty pounds per bale was made. That whenever the attention of the Commissioner was called to the custom of collecting the tax on the bagging and rope as cotton the assessor was ordered to make a suitable allowance for the tare in assessing cotton. It further appears that this order was issued to some assessors in Georgia on November 11, 1865, while in Memphis, Tenn., it went into effect December 21, 1865, and in the first and second districts of Alabama at a still later period.

"Subsequently these claimants filed their claims with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for the refunding of the money claimed to have been illegally collected. Commissioner Rollins decided to refund all that accrued after November 11, 1865, and withheld that which accrued prior to that date, although collected under the same law. By the act of July 13, 1866, it was provided that the weight of the cotton should be ascertained by deducting 4 per cent. from the gross weight of each bale or package for the tare. Commissioner Pleasanton decided to refund the tax collected on the tare prior to November 11, 1865, and large sums of money were refunded by him and his successor, Commissioner Douglass; but on his attention being called to the fact that the claims of the petitioners had been considered by a former Commissioner, Commissioner Douglass decided that he could not pay them without the authority of Congress.

"From information derived from Commissioner Raum, it appears that these are the last of this class of claims on file in the Department. The claimants now ask that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue be authorized to re-examine and settle their claims. Your committee are of opinion that they should be granted the relief prayed for."

Your committee adopt the foregoing report as stating concisely the nature of these claims. The following communication from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shows that the claims of James H. Franklin & Co., Sarah F. Prestridge, and S. P. Steele have been allowed and paid, and that instead of James H. Franklin & Co. the name should be James H. Franklin. He also suggests other amendments, and in conformity therewith your committee report herewith a substitute for the bill (S. 453) and recommend its passage.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, February 1, 1884.

SIR: The inclosed bill (S. 453) for the relief Coronna, Taussig & Co. and others, left by you at this office with the request that I would inform you whether all the parties named therein have claims on file in this Department for the amounts stated, is returned with the information that all the parties named have presented claims for the refunding of the amounts stated, or in which those amounts were included, and those claims are now on file either in this office or the office of the Register of the Treasury.

The claims of James H. Franklin & Co., Sarah F. Prestridge, and S. P. Steele were allowed for the full amount claimed, and should not therefore be included in the bill; but a claim of James H. Franklin was presented upon which $203.99 was disallowed, and this claim should be included in the bill.

I would respectfully suggest the following amendments to the bill:

On page 3, line 66, the name Gallreoth & Stewart should read Galbreath & Stewart.

On page 4, line 67, the name James H. Franklin & Co. should read James H. Franklin.

On page 4, lines 88 and 89 should be stricken out, and on page 5, lines 90 and 91 should be stricken out.

Very respectfully,

WALTER EVANS, Commissioner.

Hon. CHARLES F. MANDERSON,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 63, to strike out "Gallreoth" and insert "Galbreath;" so as to read:

Galbreath and Stewart, $339.50.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 67, after the word "Franklin," to strike out "and Company;" so as to read:

James H. Franklin, $203.99.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out from line 88 to line 91, inclusive, as follows:

Sarah F. Prestridge, $263.35.
S. P. Steele, $153.32.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM B. MOSES.

The bill (S. 1148) for the relief of William B. Moses was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read in that case.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. PIKE February 7:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1148) for the relief of William B. Moses, having considered the same, beg leave to make the following report:

That the act of Congress approved July 28, 1866, entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses for the year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes," referred to in the bill before the committee, under authority of which, as is urged, this claim is made (14 U. S. Stat. at Large, ch. 296 (1866), p. 317), provides that—

"And the legal representatives of the corporations of Washington and Georgetown, and the portion of the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, not included in said corporations, be, and they are hereby, directed to provide and suitably furnish, without delay, a suitable room for the use of the orphans' court, and two contiguous rooms and a fire-proof vault for the use of the register of wills in and for said county; and for the repayment of the expense to be incurred in executing this order the said corporations of Washington and Georgetown, and the levy court of the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, are hereby authorized and directed to levy and collect a suitable tax upon the property embraced within their respective jurisdictions."

That the claim of the said William B. Moses is for a bill of goods furnished by him to furnish the orphans' court of said District, named in the act above quoted. That the said bill, by the terms of said act, was to be paid by the corporations of Washington and Georgetown, and the levy court of the county of Washington, from a tax assessed on the property embraced in their respective jurisdictions.

The committee therefore recommend that the bill be amended by striking out all the bill after the word "claim," in the twelfth line, in said bill, and inserting in the place thereof the words following:

"And if any amount is found to be justly due the said Moses, such amount, not exceeding the sum of $313, shall be included in the estimates to be submitted to Congress for the expenditures of the District of Columbia for the next fiscal year, and paid out of such moneys as may be appropriated therefor."

The amendment of the Committee on the District of Columbia was, after the word "and," in line 12, to strike out—

Such amount, with legal interest thereon, not exceeding in full the sum of $518, as the said commissioners may find to be justly due the said Moses, shall be paid to him out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

And insert:

If any amount is found to be justly due the said Moses, such amount, not exceeding the sum of $313, shall be included in the estimates to be submitted to Congress for the expenditures of the District of Columbia for the next fiscal year, and paid out of such moneys as may be appropriated therefor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONVEYANCE OF LANDS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill (S. 1104) relating to acknowledgments of conveyances of land in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. CONGER. That bill has some very important provisions in it, and I do not think it can be disposed of within the time limited by the rule. I hope it will go over, to take its place under Rule IX.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan objects to the consideration of this bill. It will take its place on the Calendar under Rule IX.

SETTLERS ON SAINT JOSEPH AND DENVER RAILROAD LANDS.

The bill (S. 57) for the relief of settlers and purchasers of lands on the public domain in the States of Nebraska and Kansas was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

For the purpose of reimbursing persons, and the grantees, heirs, and devisees of persons, who, under the homestead, pre-emption, or other laws, settled upon or purchased lands within the grant made by an act entitled "An act for a grant of lands of the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of the Northern Kansas Railroad and Telegraph," approved July 23, 1866, and to whom patents have been issued therefor, but against which persons, or their grantees, heirs, or devisees, decrees have been, or may hereafter be, rendered by the United States circuit court on account of the priority of the grant made in that act, the sum of $250,000, or so much thereof as shall be required for the purpose, is appropriated by the bill. No part of this sum shall be paid to any one until he shall have filed with the Secretary of the Interior a copy of the decree, duly certified, and also a certificate of the judge of the court rendering the same to the effect that such decree was rendered in a bona fide controversy between a plaintiff showing title under the grant made in the act of 1866 and a defendant holding the patent or holding by deed under the patentee, and that the decision was in favor of the plaintiff on the ground of the priority of the grant made by the act to the filing, settlement, or purchase by the defendant or his grantor; and the claimant shall also file with the decree and certificate a bill of the costs in such case, duly certified by the clerk and judge of the court. Thereupon it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to adjust the amount due to each defendant on the basis of $3.50 per acre for the tract, his title to which shall have failed as aforesaid, and the costs appearing by the bill thereof. He shall then make a requisition upon the Treasury for the sum found to be due to such claimant, or his heirs and devisees or assigns, and shall pay the same to him, taking such release, acquittance, or discharge as shall forever bar any further claim against the United States on account of the failure of the title as aforesaid.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, in line 12, to strike out the words "or may hereafter be;" so as to read:

But against which persons, or their grantees, heirs, or devisees decrees have been rendered by the United States circuit, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. CONGER. I should like to have some person in charge of this bill state why the Government should pay a big sum for lands and the costs of judicial proceedings.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The easiest way will be to read the report.

Mr. CONGER. Time need not be taken in reading the report; the reason for the bill can be stated. This seems to be a general provision that all lands patented by the United States to settlers and afterward held to belong to a certain railroad company shall be paid for at $3.50 per acre, and that the costs to which the settlers have been subjected in the courts in suits where they failed shall be reimbursed.

If this were a general law making provision for all classes of cases in the United States where patents have issued to lands where a prior grant had carried the title with the grant, I should have no objection to it. I know cases where lands were sold by the United States after the passage of what is called the swamp-land act, and patents issued by the United States where by virtue of the grant in the swamp-land act the courts decided that the title vested in the State from and after the passage of the act, although a list was to be made out from descriptions in the Surveyor-General's Office and listed by the States afterward. I know of a case in my own county where a man had bought his land of the United States, paid his money, received his patent, and for over twenty years had improved the land and made it a home, spending the labor of himself and his family upon it for years. Some one found out afterward that it came within the descriptive list of swamp lands granted to the State of Michigan, and some person went and bought it of the State, brought suit, and of course under the law the title was in the last purchaser.

I have tried for years in both Houses of Congress to have some remuneration made to that man whose land was taken away from him after twenty years of hard labor upon it, and who had converted the wilderness into a beautiful farm, and in his old age was driven from it without any compensation; and the committees to whom such a case was referred decided that they had no power except by creating a dangerous precedent to pay anything to the person thus holding the United States patent for land and occupying it for twenty years and over and making it a home.

Here is a proposition to pay to those who may have entered contrary to law upon a reserved grant of land, well known and well understood, three and a half dollars an acre for all land upon which they had squatted or for which they had obtained patents by some kind of mistake. I do not know but that it is just that this bill should be passed. I think perhaps it is. I think if the United States has permitted its officers to convey by the highest title known in this country, by the seal and patent of the United States, lands to a settler by some inadvertence, when it had granted them to anybody else, railroad companies or others, this Government should pay for them. But it is not done in other cases; the United States does not pay for improvements, or value, or anything.

I do not object to the passage of this bill. I only say that it is possible that you are paying more to the settlers upon these railroad lands by fixing a price, when they may have only located and made no improvements upon them, than is justly due. When I introduce a bill to go to the same committee to pay to a man in his old age something for the value of the land which he had occupied under the laws of the United States, with its patent taken and recorded, I want it to receive some attention. The land was found to have been conveyed in 1852 or 1854 by virtue of a grant to the State of swamp lands. His tract appeared to have in it more than half of swamp lands, and therefore by that description went to the State. Congress, on two or three occasions when I have endeavored to have such a bill as that considered, has declared that it would be a dangerous precedent to require the United States to make good any losses to the purchasers of its lands.

I shall be glad to have this bill pass and shall vote for it, because at any rate it will be a precedent to which I may refer hereafter.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, the difficulties that occur to me are a little broader than the Senator from Michigan seems to consider. The swamp-land grant was a grant in præsenti, as the law terms it, and the courts have so held in a number of instances, but there was no description in that grant by way of identifying the particular lands granted, as there was in the act mentioned here. Section 4 of the act is as follows:

That as soon as the said company shall file with the Secretary of the Interior maps of its line designating the route thereof, it shall be the duty of said Secretary to withdraw from the market the lands granted by this act in such manner as may be best calculated to effect the purposes of this act and subserve the public interest.

That would seem to be very clear on the reading of it that the lands were in market when this particular thing was done and brought to the attention of the Secretary of the Interior; and before that, as I understand from this report, these settlers went on and paid for the land, and settled on it, and improved it, supposing they would have until the map was filed and this identification or this segregation from the public domain was made by the filing of the map.

Such would seem to be the reasoning of the committee; but when the case came to the district court and from there to the Supreme Court, it seems a wholly different construction was placed on it and these settlers failed to get what they considered they would be entitled to under a fair interpretation of this section 4.

Besides the case referred to in this report of the Senator from Nebraska there is a case still more recent in the one hundred and sixth or one hundred and seventh volume of United States Reports carrying out the very construction adopted in this case of Kneavels vs. Hyde. I think it is a hard case and that these settlers are reasonably entitled to be relieved; and this very bill passed before; it has already passed the Senate; it has already received the sanction of this body.

I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the description in the act of 1866 which operated to mislead these settlers was not in the swamp-land grant or in any other grant but the more recent railroad grants.

There is one matter of explanation that I think it would be well for the Senator from Nebraska to make a little more definitely than his report does. The statement in the report that the settlement shall be at three and a half dollars an acre does not seem to reveal precisely the reason for that rate. It says:

By this decision and the delay on the part of the House some of those holding patents for these lands were discouraged, and fearful they might not only lose their lands but not receive any relief from Congress made a settlement with Mr. Kneavals at $3.50 an acre.

That might be a reason for their settling at that rate; but that would not probably run through all the cases, and I should like the Senator from Nebraska to make an explanation a little more fully; and if that explanation can be made, I think the bill is perfectly satisfactory and meets the hardship these settlers have undergone in this matter.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President, I should have inserted in the committee's report a letter from the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office in which the facts in this matter are succinctly stated; and in order that they may be published in the RECORD I will take the liberty now of reading. They will in a measure explain the point suggested by the Senator from Arkansas:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 24, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt by your reference, for report, of a communication from Hon. P. B. PLUMB, chairman of the Senate Committee on Public Lands, dated the 7th instant, transmitting Senate bill No. 57, entitled "A bill for the relief of settlers and purchasers of lands on the public domain in the States of Nebraska and Kansas."

In reply I have to state the bill pertains to certain lands within the limits of the grant to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of the Northern Kansas Railroad and Telegraph, now known as the Saint Joseph and Denver City Railroad Company (14 Stats., page 210).

The records of this office show that a map of the definite location of the Saint Joseph and Denver City Railroad as adopted by the board of directors of the company, March 21, 1870, was received in this office with a letter from the then Secretary of the Interior, dated the 28th of the same month.

By letter from this office, dated the 8th of April, 1870, the local officers of the several land districts in which the grant was located were directed to withdraw from sale or entry all the odd-numbered sections within the limits of the grant. This order was received at the local offices April 13 and 15, 1870, which dates were formerly held as the times when the right of the company vested to the lands granted.

Under that construction of the granting act entries were allowed to be made for lands within the limits of the grant until said dates, April 13 and 15, 1870.

This appears to have been the established rule of the office in compliance with the provisions of the act approved March 27, 1854 (Revised Statutes, 2281). (See circular of February 10, 1870, Copp's Land Laws, page 403).

That rule was subsequently change by the opinion of Assistant Attorney-General Smith, concurred in by the then Secretary of the Interior, dated April 28, 1871, in the case of S. M. Boyd vs. The Burlington and Missouri Railroad Company (Copp's Land Laws, page 392), and afterward it was held by the Department that the right of the company attached on the day of the adoption of the line by the company, March 21, 1870.

March 25 and April 1, 1872, a number of entries which had been initiated between March 21 and April 15, 1870, were held for cancellation so far as they included odd-numbered sections within the limits of the grant to said company.

Appeals were taken by parties in interest, and two cases, that of A. W. Nickell, cash entry No. 3097, and W. L. Cutler, homestead entry No. 4039, were submitted to the Department as test cases August 6, 1872.

September 3, 1872, the acting Secretary, W. H. Smith, held as follows:

"These entries and the others of like character were allowed under a ruling of your office then in force, to the effect that the railroad acquired no right to lands until the notice of withdrawal was received at the local office. You directed them to be canceled, pursuant to a later ruling of the Department on the subject.

"This ruling is intended to be prospective in its operation, and not to disturb past transactions. Your decision is therefore reversed." * * *

In compliance therewith this office released that class of entries from suspension.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of VanWyck vs. Kneavals, held that the right of the company attached on the day of the acceptance by the Secretary of the Interior of the map of the definite location of the road, which was March 28, 1870 (16 Otto, 360).

Under this decision, if the land was clear of adverse claims at that date, and was entered or purchased from the Government prior to April 15, 1870, the patents issued thereon are invalid.

The pending bill proposes relief for that class of settlers or purchasers whose claims had their inception subsequent to March 28, 1870, in cases where the lands were not excepted from the operation of the grant by prior valid adverse claims.

It is apparent from the foregoing that settlers who, under the rulings of the Department, were permitted to initiate claims upon lands within this grant after said date, and subsequently received patents for the same from the Government, which the courts have declared invalid, have strong equities, and I think the proposition for their relief embraced in the bill as good as any that occurs to me and which would be practicable.

I think the bill should pass.

The bill referred by you is herewith returned.

I am, very respectfully,

N. C. McFARLAND, Commissioner.

Hon. H. M. TELLER,
Secretary of the Interior.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, January, 29, 1884.

SIR: Senate bill 57, "for the relief of settlers and purchasers of lands on the public domain in the States of Nebraska and Kansas," was received by your reference of the 7th instant, and referred to the Commissioner of the General Land Office. I have the honor to inclose herewith copy of his report on the subject under date of the 24th instant.

Very respectfully,

H. M. TELLER, Secretary.

Hon. P. B. PLUMB,
Chairman Committee on Public Lands, United States Senate.

In further explanation of the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas, I will say that from this statement of facts there is no question as to the right of the persons settling, purchasing, and holding patents from the Government and the duty of the Government toward them. There is no dispute anywhere in this body or in the Department that this relief should be had. This certainly is a remarkable case, where the statute was supposed to be so plain that the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior, and even the common man who was seeking a home on the prairies, could read and understand it fully. Then, after ten years had elapsed from the entry the settlers were in danger of eviction by the grantee of a railroad company; the Supreme Court disturbed the patents which were given by this Government by a most remarkably strange decision; and the question arises now as to what mode of relief should be extended to these parties. It was at first supposed at a previous Congress that two dollars and a half per acre would probably satisfy this claim. Since that time Congress has failed to enact a law. True, a bill was passed in the Forty-seventh Congress by this body, but too late to be acted upon by the House, so that it went over without final action. Naturally the settlers became discouraged. They wanted to save their homes; they were pressed by a Supreme Court decision from which there was no appeal; nothing stood between their homes and the process of law to dispossess them, after ten years of labor upon these lands, where children had been born and buried. When the marshal of the district about to execute the process was on the way to dispossess them, then it was that it became necessary in order to save their possessions that some further compromise should be made. Certainly it was liberal on the part of the party having the decree of the Supreme Court in his favor—a settlement was agreed on at three dollars and a half per acre; a generous settlement, because, although the decision of the Supreme Court was unjust toward the settlers and toward the Government, and was a judicial repeal of a solemn act of Congress, still the claimant had this decision in his favor, and I refer to it now as a tribute to the generosity and humanity of Mr. Kneavals that he was willing to concede land worth $20 or $25 an acre to the settlers at three dollars and a half per acre.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. CALL. I would ask the Senator from Nebraska if he would have any objection to accepting an amendment making this bill general in its provisions? I see no reason why a man who has bought lands from the United States and whose title has failed should not in all cases receive an adequate compensation. Ever since I have been in the Senate I have had an application pending before the Committee on Claims and on file in the Department for the return of money paid for lands more than forty years ago—for the simple return of the money where the title failed. It does not matter from what cause the United States has sold a piece of land to one of its citizens and the title has failed, there should be compensation made; the money should be returned and some interest upon it. I can see nothing to except this particular case from the general equity which relates to every one of such cases; and if there was no objection I would ask that the bill be amended so as to apply to every one that has bought lands of the United States the title to which has failed.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I agree with the Senator that we should have some law on that subject, and the want of it is the great difficulty in all these cases; but I prefer he should not ask it as an amendment to this bill. There has been an effort made in the Public Lands Committee, and I think in other committees, to frame a bill which will reach all these cases. And now I say to my friend, this would be a most excellent time, when we have an overflowing Treasury, when we are ready to expend our millions on the Navy, when we are ready to spend millions for a building for a library at the capital, when we are willing to spend millions for educational purposes—now would be a most excellent time for this Government to do justice, stern justice, to a class of its citizens upon whom it has always turned its back. I agree with my friend that now is the time that honest claimants scattered through the States and Territories of the West should be paid from the Treasury, and a general bill passed. The world may admire our generosity: it would still more admire justice.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator from Nebraska allow me to ask a question? Does not the Government of the United States now in all cases where a patent is canceled return to the patentee all the money he paid into the Treasury for the land embraced in the patent?

Mr. VAN WYCK. No, sir; it does not.

Mr. McMILLAN. I have never known a case where it did not do it.

Mr. VAN WYCK. That is not the practice.

Mr. CALL. I will state to the Senator from Minnesota that I do not know whether there is any act of Congress requiring such a return of the money or not. I do know, however, that where there has been simply a certificate of entry made there are cases now pending both before the Committee on Claims here and before the Department in which money has been paid for land the title to which could not be made by the Government, and which the Land Office declined to make for some good reason, because they had previously granted it, or did not have it, and that money has not been and can not now be obtained from the Department.

Mr. McMILLAN. I have understood that the Government always returned the purchase-money to the purchaser where the title was defeated after the patent had been issued by the Government.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to say that the explanation of the Senator from Nebraska of the basis on which the $3.50 is to be paid, the statement that that was a general arrangement in behalf of these settlers with the other parties claiming the land, is satisfactory to me, and I shall vote for the bill with pleasure.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BOSTON STATE NATIONAL BANK.

The bill (S. 29) for the relief of the State National Bank of Boston, Mass., was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. GARLAND. Let that go over.

Mr. JACKSON. I ask the Senator from Arkansas if he will consent to let it retain its place on the Calendar and be taken up on Monday?

Mr. GARLAND. Not under the five-minute rule. I should not like to have it taken up under the five-minute rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The consideration of the bill being objected to, it will take its place on the Calendar under Rule IX.

AMERICAN SHIPPING.

The bill (S. 1448) to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign carrying trade, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. FRYE. This is a bill which it will be impossible to consider under this rule. It is a bill of very great importance. I have consulted with several Senators who will take part for and against the bill in discussion, and I will move that it be made a special order for May 1, at 2 o'clock p. m.

Mr. BECK. I hope that motion will not be carried. This is a bill which, if anything is to be done with it, has to be acted upon very promptly. While I am not one of the gentlemen the Senator has seen fit to consult (and, perhaps, he was right, although I urged the bill before his committee and have done so several times), I shall endeavor to have as early action upon the bill as possible.

May 1 means nothing in my opinion. I do not wish to be arbitrary about it, but I know of no reason why the bill should be postponed to that time. Such is the urgency to have some definite action in regard to our merchant marine that I believe a majority of the Senate now, upon a motion made to take up the bill, notwithstanding an objection, would take it up and proceed with it.

I see no reason why a month and more than a month shall be allowed to elapse, when we expect to get away perhaps by the close of May, at which time the tariff bill and the appropriation bills, not one of which has yet been acted upon, will be so obviously in the way that this bill will never even be looked at. Thirteen important appropriation bills, on which there are serious differences of opinion between the House and the Senate, as there always will be when the two bodies are of different political complexion, especially just preceding a Presidential election, will occupy very much of the time, much more than usual, and I regret to say they are held back much longer than usual, as the Senator from Maine knows; so that his bill, if put off till the 1st of May, will never be heard from. It can be heard now. There is nothing in the way.

That is one reason why I, perhaps without having a right to say anything, object. I am prepared to argue one side of the bill now or at any time, and so are others; and the delay of over a month is equivalent to not discussing it, in view of the appropriation bills we have to pass and the possibility of some tariff legislation.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Kentucky will allow me, I suggest that if an objection is now made and the Senator from Kentucky shall move to proceed, notwithstanding the objection, that will relieve the bill from the operation of the five-minute rule, and that perhaps would meet the views both of the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BECK. It meets mine. I shall object if the motion be made to postpone the bill until May.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Kentucky whether there is any earthly use in sending from the United States Senate to-day a bill to the House of Representatives on the table of which there are now 320 Senate bills, and to which table the House has not yet proceeded?

Mr. BECK. I will answer that by saying that if there is no use in sending the bill there to-day there will be no use in sending it after the first Monday in May, when there will be 600 bills on the Speaker's table instead of 300, in all probability.

Mr. FRYE. There has been a time assigned in another House for the consideration of a bill similar to this. I call the Senator's attention to that. Suppose the House should consider that bill similar to this within a week and should send it to the Senate, and that then that bill should be taken by the Senate and amended according to the opinions of the Senate and sent back to the House, I ask whether it would not be in a much better condition for action by both branches than for the Senate to-day, for instance, to send this bill to the House?

Mr. BECK. I will answer that supposition by saying that I do not regard it as either probable or possible that any such thing will occur. I know that the agricultural appropriation bill, the Army appropriation bill, and other bills are pressing there for a hearing from the Appropriations Committee. I have taken pains to inquire with regard to those bills. Many of them will involve long discussion. It is known that the Morrison tariff bill will be pressed at a very early day, which will involve a good deal of discussion, and that there is no chance in the world to have anything done in regard to the merchant-marine unless the Senate takes it up at the very earliest possible day and presses it with all the power of the Senate.

I expect to be able to show, and I think the Senator from Maine will show (for I agree with him in many things he desires to do, and I expect to vote for this bill in many of its provisions if I can not go further), that there is an urgent necessity for the passage of this bill; and we have now to consider it, and to press it, and urge it from this moment on, or it will receive no consideration at this session of Congress. The hour of 2 o'clock has arrived, I see by the gavel; let the bill go over and we can speak of it on Monday morning.

Mr. VEST rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived——

Mr. FRYE. If the Presiding Officer will pardon me, I should like to hear what the Senator from Missouri, who has risen in his seat, wishes to say about this, as he has, I believe, to go away.

Mr. VEST. I rose simply for the purpose of asking the Senator from Maine a question. My information in regard to the matter, coming from the House, is very different from what he seems to state. From the RECORD, if I may be permitted to refer to the proceedings of the House on this subject, it seems that yesterday the shipping bill was postponed in favor of another measure, and I am not aware of any bill that involves the principle or contains the provisions in the bill that we have reported from the Committee on Commerce here which is likely to come up soon in the House. The Senator may have that information, but certainly not from the RECORD. My information is that the earliest day at which the Commerce Committee of the House expect to bring this matter before that body is the third Monday in April.

Mr. FRYE. I have not received any information within the last two days.

Mr. VEST. If the Senator will look at the proceedings in the House yesterday he will see that the Commerce Committee undertook to bring up the shipping bill; that several measures were proposed, and another measure was taken up instead of the shipping bill, and it is now indefinitely postponed in the House. I mean to say there is no particular time in which it can come up. I was informed by the chairman of the Commerce Committee of the House that it is not possible to reach it there before the third Monday in April or the first Monday in May.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. We seem to be violating three rules of the Senate at once. I do not know whether it is right to violate any more or not.

Mr. FRYE. I ask leave to do it by unanimous consent. I was consulting the convenience of the Senator from Missouri somewhat in this matter, who informed me that at a certain time he would be obliged to leave the city. If the Senator from Missouri is entirely willing to go on with the shipping bill, I will make the motion at the next call of the Calendar.

Mr. VEST. I prefer to go on with it now rather than to have the matter go over, because I shall be obliged to leave here by the 15th of April. I would rather take up the shipping bill now, as far as I am personally concerned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the resolution of the Senate to print 3,000 copies of the report of Julius E. Hilgard, Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, for the year ending June 30, 1883.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 193) to provide for printing certain documents relating to customs revenues and domestic exports for the use of Congress; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. PLUMB to recommit the bill to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate only a few moments, not with the expectation of adding anything new to the arguments that have been advanced on this subject, but simply to state my own reasons for the vote which I shall give. I have bestowed upon the constitutional question involved in this measure the study which its importance deserves. I shall not go over the ground already occupied by the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND], and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH], nor will I recite the imposing authorities arrayed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN]. I have no doubt about the constitutional authority of Congress to pass this measure. Indeed, if we should reject it on the ground that it is unconstitutional for Congress to give aid to the States in the exercise of their exclusive jurisdiction over the education of their people, we would be reversing the settled policy of this Government.

The refinements and subtleties about the distinction between the granting of land and an appropriation of money for educational purposes do not satisfy my mind. Even if such a distinction would hold, it does not apply to the constitutional question that is made. It is not the kind of aid granted, whether it be in land or in money, but the purpose for which it is granted, that is to be considered. It is the threatened intervention of the Federal Government into the educational affairs of a State to which the constitutional objection applies, and intervention is as menacing when it comes in the form of a land grant as when it comes in the shape of an appropriation. I do not regard it as a menace in either case.

Nor do the objections so forcibly presented by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] strike my mind as sufficiently strong to justify a vote against this measure. The specification of the studies, the mere prescription that geography, reading, writing, and arithmetic shall be taught in those schools, I do not think can be called a condition or dictation; they are words of description. It is simply saying that common-school education shall be taught, and it is another mode of expressing the very object of the bill as it has been reported. If instead of the words "reading, writing, arithmetic, and geography" the words "the usual common-school education" had been substituted, it seems to me the same object would have been accomplished.

I, however, do not intend, I say, to repeat the argument which has been forcibly presented in support of the constitutionality of this measure. I do not see any entering-wedge, as it is called, in this bill toward Federal intervention in the jurisdiction of the State over the education of its children, and if there exists any such tendency in the public mind, in my opinion the passage of this bill will arrest it.

Nor do I see any dangerous precedent in it. I do not think it is wise or just reasoning to say that a thing that is right in itself, beneficent in its objects, may be in the future perverted into a wrong, nor do I anticipate it. I have watched the progress of this scheme from the time it was first introduced into the other House, many years ago, down to the present time, when it has taken its present shape as presented by the Senator from New Hampshire. I have watched it with deep interest and intense solicitude. In my opinion it is the first step and the most important step that this Government has ever taken in the direction of the solution of what is called the race problem, and I believe it will tell more powerfully and decisively upon the future destinies of the colored race in America than any measure or ordinance that has yet been adopted in reference to it—more decisively than either the thirteenth, fourteenth, or fifteenth amendments, unless it is to be considered, as I do consider it, the logical sequence and the practical continuance of those amendments.

I think that this measure is fraught with almost unspeakable benefits to the entire population of the South, white and black. Apart altogether from the material aid—and that cannot be overvalued—apart from the contribution of this bounteous donation of money, it will give an impulse to the cause of common-school education in that section which will tell on the interests of the people through the long coming future. It will excite a new interest among our people; it will stimulate both State and local communities to more energetic exertions and to greater sacrifices, because it will encourage them in their hopes in grappling and struggling with a task before whose vast proportions they have stood appalled in the consciousness of the inadequacy of their own resources to meet it.

It is true, as some gentlemen have stated, that before the war the common-school system did not flourish in the South. We had an education there, and an educated people whose culture was as high as that of any people on earth. They were a people, one-fourth of them at least, perhaps, who had all the function and discipline and intellectual development that the finest education could give, not only from their own colleges at home, but from the best universities in America and Europe. It is true that owing to the sparseness of our population and to other causes the common school did not thrive, and there were prejudices against the common school as an efficient means of diffusing education—prejudices they may be called, but such as are now entertained and expressed by some of the ablest writers in the North. Be that as it may, though the common-school education did not prevail in that section to as great an extent as in other parts of the country, they were a better educated people than one would imagine from the statistics of illiteracy. They were educated in the school of American citizenship, and they reached a discipline and a maturity of thought and an acquaintance with public and social duties that showed itself in a war in which grand armies stretching nearly across the continent found themselves baffled with alternate victory and defeat, and the fate of this Union held in the balance for four years. No ignorant and debased population could have stood before such a power with such heroic resistance for such a time.

But the result of the war overthrew the conditions of society, and colleges, schools, and academies shared in the general crash and desolation. In that section the educated classes suffered more than all others. They were more impoverished than any other class, and their children more imperiled by falling back into ignorance than any other class; and now the common-school system has become the indispensable factor in diffusing education generally throughout the South.

The people of the South have attempted to meet the emergency. They have rebuilt in a large degree their colleges, academies, and schools in the towns, villages, and cities, and they have made great sacrifices. Although the remark has been made more than once that it is impossible for any except one who lives in their midst to know the extent of the efforts and sacrifices they have made, I must yet call attention to it here.

Guizot in one of his great speeches once said that the overthrow, prostration, and demolition of the political institutions of a country was equal in the political world to the swallowing up of a city by an earthquake, and that it would be as difficult to reconstruct the one as it would be to resurrect and rebuild the other. Extravagant as the illustration is, we have learned by a costly experience that there is much truth in it. Yet we have made the effort, and our people have taxed themselves and are still taxing themselves at a rate that is equal in some of our States to that of any other section of the Union.

But the progress has been slow, the difficulties have been great, the burden has been grievous, and we stand, I say, almost appalled by the immense obstacles in the way. The generous, wise, and beneficent action of the Government proposed by this measure, as I said before, would reanimate and infuse new hopes in our people; it will be a manifestation of respect and confidence and affection which will draw them into closer relations, if possible, to the Government, and dispel whatever impressions past events have produced that it stands in an attitude of sternness and hostility toward them.

The objection which has been made in the course of the debate that this donation is too large, that the fund is too big and comes too abruptly to be availed of in that section, is based upon a misapprehension of facts, and the conclusion is erroneous. There is machinery there fully adequate to the disbursement and application of this fund to the wisest purposes for which it is intended. We have school-house accommodations for far more scholars than have attended or will attend. I speak from positive knowledge when I state to the Senate that there is in the shape of teachers—competent, well educated, full of aspiration for honorable usefulness and distinction in that field—material I believe superior to that in any other section of the Union, for we have not the diversified avenues to careers which you have in other sections.

I have some tables here which I shall not trespass upon the time of the Senate in reading, but I will ask the privilege of incorporating them in my remarks, to show the extent to which we have laid the foundation upon which any superstructure, no matter how large, might be raised for common-school education.

We have, as I said before, school-houses, we have teachers and the material for making teachers. All we need is the money to apply to these ends. We can carry on in the rural districts this instruction for four months in some of the States, as in my own, and in the cities and towns for eight months, but we have not the means for prolonging the tuition. If we had, the blessings of education would be multiplied beyond the mere proportion of the extension of the time, for such is the character of the occupations of our people that they are not able to send their children to school in large numbers at any one time and for any very protracted period. The culture of the cotton crop, especially in the lower portions of the Gulf States, requires nearly all the months in the year. They begin in the early part of the year, sometimes in December of the preceding year, to bed up the land; the field work goes on until in July, when we have a short vacation through August into September, and then the children go in larger numbers to the schools; until about the middle of September, when cotton-picking commences, and continues until Christmas and often later; but if our terms were prolonged, as they would be if we had the means of employing the teachers, there would be all through the year children sent to those schools for short periods, where they are now excluded by the shortness of our present period.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON], in the remarks which he submitted to the Senate yesterday, stated that there was not a child within the limits of that State within the ages prescribed for education who did not have the means to acquire, or at least who could not acquire, the elements of a common-school education. Sir, that remark is as applicable in its fullest, most literal meaning to Mississippi as it is to Indiana. There is not a child in that State from 5 years old to 21, and if he chooses to go after he is 21, who would not be admitted into school should he apply. No matter what his color, he can then find the means of education.

I would regret very much if the amendment offered by one Senator should by its adoption here mar and impair the effect of this bill. I mean the amendment which proposes that the fund shall go into the hands of Federal agencies, and be distributed by them to the exclusion of the State officers. The effect of such an amendment would be a discrimination. It would give to the measure instead of its present generous and beneficent aspect a harsh and ungracious look and effect.

Senators have expressed the opinion that this fund will not be fairly administered, that such is the prejudice of race, that such is the darkening influence of slavery, that with the best intention our people and officials are incapable of administering this fund equally and equitably to all.

I say that I should regret the adoption of such an amendment for the reason that it would change the entire aspect and character of this bill and show that this Government intended to keep up discriminations; that while it is animated with a desire to benefit and improve and elevate and edify one race, it looks upon the other as an object of distrust and suspicion. It would be the enactment of the color line.

Mr. HARRISON. Is the Senator from Mississippi speaking of my amendment?

Mr. LAMAR. No, sir; I have looked over the Senator's amendment, and while it will not receive my support I will state with perfect frankness that I do not think it is amenable to that criticism.

Mr. President, the surest way to make a people worthy of trust is to trust them; and the surest mode of producing alienation and making them stand aloof in sullen opposition or perhaps active obstruction and antagonism upon such a subject as this is to treat them as objects of distrust and disapprobation and to manifest toward them a want of confidence which they feel they do not deserve. I say with entire confidence that this distrust is not deserved; that Senators are mistaken as to the state of feeling in the South with reference to the education of the negro. The people of the South find that the most precious interests of their society and civilization are bound up in the question of his education, of his elevation out of his present state of barbarism. I shall enter into no argument upon that subject. I intended to read some authorities upon it, but my friend from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON] has anticipated me. I will call attention, however, to the fact that distinguished educators, who are supposed to be familiar by observation with the temper and character of our people and the history of their course upon this subject, entertain quite an opposite view.

A Northern man, the Hon. J. H. Smart, for many years superintendent of public instruction in the State of Indiana, speaks upon this question after an extended observation through the Southern States. I invoke attention to the testimony of this distinguished educator. He says:

> I want to say that throughout the length and breadth of the Southern States, without one exception—

Mark it, sir. His language is exhaustive, "without one exception"— > the colored people are given the same advantages that the white people are given.

This is with the taxes imposed upon the white people themselves by themselves.

And I believe from what I saw that we are able to trust the existing State organizations represented by these gentlemen; we are able to trust them with whatever means we can appropriate, and I speak after some investigation and after deliberation.

Dr. Mayo, of Massachusetts, uses the following language. I shall not read it all to the Senate, but simply wish to concentrate his testimony upon this point:

I have no hesitation in announcing to you, gentlemen, my conviction that never within ten years in the history of the world has an effort so great, so persistent, and so absolutely heroic been made by any people for the education of the children as by the leading class of the people in our Southern States.

Practically, within ten years every one of these Southern States has put on its statute-book a system of public schools; practically, within this time every district of country in the South has received something that can be called a school. This school public, as we may call it, consisting of State officials, of school officers, of superior teachers, of thoughtful people all over the South, is to my mind the most forcible, the most persistent, the most devoted school public now in any part of the world. There is no body of superior teachers doing so much work for so little pay and under such great disadvantages as in the South to-day. There is no minority of people working so hard to overcome this terrible calamity of illiteracy anywhere in the world to-day as in the South.

Sir, should such a people be smitten in the face? Let me read you some other remarks of this gentleman in a more elaborate address upon this subject. After giving the difficulties under which the South labored after the war and speaking of the imperiled condition of the educational interests of those States and the necessity for going to work at once to re-establish their colleges, academies, and schools, he uses the following language:

To this work they bent themselves with a singleness of purpose and a pertinacity thoroughly American and deserving of all praise.

* * * * * * *

So, for the past fifteen years these people have toiled as nobody can know but themselves, through sacrifices almost incomprehensible to our wealthy Northern communities, to rehabilitate their little colleges and academies, and to furnish the small amount necessary to give their children such education as they might in these schools. I undertake to say that this effort alone entitles the South to the profound interest, even admiration, of all thoughtful schoolmen everywhere.

I am sure that if honorable Senators had known these facts they would not have uttered upon this floor the language of depreciation, distrust, and suspicion.

But to do this—

He says—

it has been necessary that the most eminent teachers should be overwhelmed with work and live on starvation wages; that great numbers of women of the highest social position, and the daughters of the leading families, should give their lives to the work of instruction; that families strangely impoverished should contrive to pinch themselves for the schooling of their young people; and that great numbers should still be dependent on the benevolence of neighbors and school corporations for what they obtained.

It is impossible, of course, to say how much this great rehabilitation has cost the Southern people. He goes on to say:

But the Southern people have not paused with this attempt at the reconstruction of the secondary and higher education for the white race. Beyond this, of their own notion—

Mark it, sir, "of their own notion"— in every State, within the past ten years, the people's elementary common school for white and colored children has been placed on the ground, defended through the dangers of its infancy, made better every year, until it has become a vital institution of Southern civilization.

Black and white. Here is the language in which he speaks of the teachers engaged in this work:

A better class of people, more earnest, more determined to improve, more self-denying, working on wages painfully and sometimes pitifully inadequate, can not be found in any Christian land than the majority of the public-school teachers of the South. The State superintendents of education and many of the city and county supervisors are the same sort of people as our leading educators of the North.

* * * * * * *

And now the traveler through the Southland finds himself everywhere in the presence of an educational revival as marked as in New England in the days of Horace Mann.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] spoke of that great movement of education as characteristic of that State which, he said, leads the column of educated States.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, I should like very much to say that the name of Mr. Mayo, whose testimony he has just read, deserves to be ranked with that of Mr. Mann as an authority, and that he is entitled to the gratitude of the American people for his work in this cause.

Mr. LAMAR. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Massachusetts for this tribute to the character of Dr. Mayo, and upon this indorsement by the Senator from Massachusetts I reiterate his assertion here in the presence of the Senate:

And now the traveler through the Southland finds himself everywhere in the presence of an educational revival as marked as in New England in the days of Horace Mann. And the blessedness of this revival is that it is bringing together the children and youth, their teachers, the younger parents, and the more thoughtful people of North and South, as no movement in the political, the ecclesiastical, or even the industrial sphere of national life can possibly succeed in doing.

I have no further extracts to read upon this subject. My object has been not to recriminate nor even to repel, but simply to adduce testimony of an incontrovertible character to convince honorable Senators upon this floor that their apprehensions upon this subject are needless and that the precautions which they would take are useless.

I would regret the proposed amendment for more reasons than those I have given. It would impair the working of the common-school system of the South, or of any other section of the country, to introduce two sets of agencies in its administration. Instead of being a harmonious co-operation of State organization and national aid there would be perhaps an antagonism, certainly disconnected effort and discordant forces. There would be both time and money spent, which if you used a single agency under the present system already occupying the ground would be concentrated in one harmonious effort. Besides, as it is now, the agencies which this bill selects are the agencies which are amenable to the public opinion and the restraining moral sentiment of the people among whom they will operate, whereas the other would be in the hands of comparative strangers who would have no relation to the constituency in which they were working and would be uninfluenced by the supervision of the people at home. They would be responsible to no one there, to no restraining public sentiment, but simply to the appointing power at a great distance, too often governed by political considerations instead of the interests intrusted to them.

I said at the beginning of these remarks (and I have protracted them much further than I intended) that in my opinion this bill is a decided step toward the solution of the problem of race. The problem of race in a large part is the problem of illiteracy. Most of the evils, most of the difficulties which have grown up out of that problem have arisen from a condition of ignorance, prejudice, and superstition. Remove these, and the simpler elements of the question will come into play with a more enlightened understanding and a more tolerant disposition. I will go with those who will go farthest in this matter.

Liberty can not be manufactured by statutes or constitutions or laws. It is a moral and intellectual growth. It is the outgrowth of men's natures, and feelings, and passions, and instincts, and habits of thought. A people who remain ignorant and superstitious and debased can not be made free by all the constitutional guarantees and statutes that you surround them with. You may force power upon them and subject others to their rule, but the great attribute of self-government and that real liberty which comes from it you can not confer on them while they remain ignorant and in bondage to their own passions and to their own prejudices and superstitions.

Sir, in my opinion institutions and laws and governments and all the fixed facts of society are but the material embodiment of the thought of a people and the substantial expression of their inner life; and liberty, which is the culmination of them all, is a boon that can not be conferred upon men, but to be permanently possessed and enjoyed must be earned, as the reward of the development of our moral and intellectual faculties.

> No State stands sure but on the ground of right,
> Of virtue, knowledge, judgment to preserve,
> And all the powers of learning requisite.

Mr. President, no one has the right to predict that this or any class of people will not rise to that plane of intelligence and moral elevation necessary to the enjoyment of this great blessing and therefore refuse to vote for a measure like this which proposes to aid them in their effort to emerge from that condition which centuries of barbarism have entailed upon them. For my part, I say that I would leave no legitimate effort unused and no constitutional means unemployed which would give to every human being in this country that highest title to American citizenship—virtue, knowledge, and judgment.

I am not an optimist as to the rapid progress of the black people in education. However earnest they may be, there will be great difficulty even with the aid of the Federal Government in establishing effective schools for all. We are yet but in the incipience of this great work; hardly gone further than establishing the educational machinery on the ground. A task of colossal magnitude is before us, and a dense mass of ignorance has to be penetrated. But, sir, whatever of disappointment may attend it, whatever of failure, whatever of error and mistake and even abuses of trust may cripple and embarrass this movement, the great idea of popular education which has animated the North, and is animating the South, and in which this bill has originated, will inspire both to guard and guide the vast host in its slow, hesitating, but onward advance to knowledge and true freedom.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Mississippi who has just concluded his remarks to say that the criticism on the objection which had been made by some of us to what we thought to be the too liberal appropriation in this bill, namely, that there was not in the South the adequate preparation to receive and use wisely this money, was not well taken in his opinion; and I understood the Senator to say that his own State was as well supplied with competent, well-equipped teachers to take charge of the common schools as any State in the Union, perhaps better supplied by reason of the fact that there were not there so many avenues into which the enterprising and talented and educated could go.

Now, Mr. President, I desire simply, in response, to read from the report of the superintendent of schools for the State of Mississippi for the year 1880–'81 his statement as to the condition of the supply of teachers in that State. He says:

> The State is sadly in demand of educated and trained teachers in her public schools. How this demand is to be supplied is a question of great importance. That we have some as good teachers as are to be found elsewhere is true no doubt, but they are, comparatively speaking, few.

So that the superintendent of education for that State, speaking with reference to the limited revenues which he was superintending, declares that there is an inadequate supply for the schools now established, and he discusses the question as to how suitable teachers are to be secured, urging the establishment of a normal school for white teachers in order that this want may be met.

So, then, it seems, upon the testimony of that officer of Mississippi who is charged with the duty of superintending the schools, that there is now an inadequate supply of competent teachers to teach the schools that are at present established in that State. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. LAMAR. Just one word in reply to the Senator from Indiana. I admit that the quotation is perfectly appropriate to my remarks, but I speak from a knowledge equal to that of the superintendent of public education in Mississippi in reiterating my statement; and it is not inconsistent with the one which has just been read. There is an inadequate supply of competent teachers in view of the limited revenues for the purpose of employing them in that State. You can not command such teachers with the small salary that we are compelled to give to them, for the short period of time we employ them, from the State revenue that we raise by our taxation; and it is true of other States. I know something about this difficulty, for I have been connected with the education of the youth of the South, and I say that there is no State and no society composed of more cultivated, upright, and ambitious young men, with trained faculties and with ambition to excel in this department of teaching, than the State of Mississippi; but at the very inadequate remuneration which is given to teachers on account of the limited resources of the State and local communities they are forced to seek other vocations as a livelihood.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I have not taken part in the discussion of the bill before the Senate, for the reason that I am profoundly impressed with the sense of personal responsibility for my vote upon a measure so far-reaching in its consequences, and I have desired to learn wisdom from the speeches of the Senators who have preceded me. I have listened to the debate with the greatest interest and profit. I am in sympathy with the end sought to be attained by this measure, and I will not say that I will not vote for the bill in its present shape, but I feel, as other gentlemen who have spoken also feel, that it ought to be amended in some particular, in order to make it satisfactory to its friends and consistent with the principles which, in my judgment, should govern our action upon the question of appropriating moneys from the national Treasury in aid of popular education.

Under our system of government the duty of providing for the education of the children of the people of the United States has always been regarded, and I think that it has been properly regarded, as the duty, not of the Federal Government, but of the several States, each acting for itself as an individual political community. There is but one ground on which the interference of the Federal Government or Federal aid in behalf of the public-school system of any State in the Union can be defended or excused, namely, that the State to which such aid is granted is not in a condition to educate its own citizens without such aid, and that in consequence of its inability or indisposition to do its duty in this regard the security and well-being of the other States or of the nation as a whole is threatened. So far as the State of Illinois, which I have the honor in part to represent, is in question, no such inability or indisposition can be charged against her citizens. Her wealth, her resources, her freedom from debt, and the intelligence, energy, and liberality of her people command the admiration of all who know her history and her condition.

I am sure that I represent her truly when I say that she neither asks nor desires to receive one dollar from the Congress of the United States as an educational grant. Her educational interests would be injured, rather than advanced, were she to accept it; because, being abundantly able, and as willing as she is able to take care of herself in this respect, it would be a calamity were she to be encouraged to rely to any extent upon any but her own resources for moneys which her citizens already gladly contribute. I therefore desire to see striken from this bill every line and every word which contains a suggestion of the propriety of making any appropriation to be expended within the bounds of any State in the same financial condition of solvency and ability.

The interest which the State of Illinois has, in common with the entire country, in the passage of a matured and perfected national education bill is indirect and impersonal. It arises from the peculiar situation in which certain States of the Union found themselves at the close of the late war. I speak not as a partisan, and not with any disposition to allude in any offensive or unpleasant sense to the events which are long past. I am a Republican, but in my capacity as a Republican I am of necessity a friend to the South, because the South is an integral part of the American people. In every word which I may utter and in every vote which I am called to cast upon the floor of this Senate, I trust that I may never forget the obligation which rests upon every Senator to have a just regard to the interest of the entire nation without reference to State or party lines. The question before us for consideration is in no sense sectional or political in its nature, and to discuss it as if it were so would be to degrade it and to dishonor ourselves.

The States to which I refer were before the war slaveholding States. As such they contained and they still contain a disproportionately large negro population. Under the system of slavery this negro population was not to any considerable extent afforded the opportunity of obtaining an education in letters; it was taught to labor, but not to read. Accordingly, it was and is an illiterate population. Since the emancipation of the slaves many negro children and some adult negroes have acquired the rudiments of an English education; but the figures which the Senator from New Hampshire quoted from the census of 1880 show that at that date, fifteen years after the close of the war, a trifle over 50 per cent. of the negro population of the South, or more than half, were unable to write their own names. No similar condition of illiteracy exists in any Northern State, and no equal condition of illiteracy exists among the white population in any Southern State, though I believe that the presence of so dense a mass of illiterate negroes in any community has a natural and inevitable tendency to reduce the proportion of educated whites, and that the white population of the Southern States will never be educated as it might and ought to be until provision is made for the education of the negro also.

Here, then, we have the peril to the Republic which, as I have intimated, justifies the Republic in taking measures for its own safety. That popular education is an indispensable condition of national progress, inasmuch as it promotes the acquisition of wealth and is a barrier to immorality, is an axiomatic truth, which is equally applicable to all communities, whatever may be their form of political organization and of government. But a republic which depends for its existence upon the right of suffrage, and whose policy on all national questions is shaped by the ballot, requires more than any other government that intelligence shall be the universal heritage of its citizens. There is no enemy of the Republic who does not make the public-school system of this country the point of his attack, either open or insidious, as the case may be; and there is no friend of the Republic who should not do all that may be in his power to defend and strengthen it. The negro is now a citizen. He has a vote. It is of the utmost importance that he should be qualified to vote intelligently. Therefore he should receive whatever education he may be capable of receiving, and all the education which we are able to give him.

I am glad to have the opportunity of listening to the Senator from Mississippi who has just closed his speech, showing so far as I can see that there is in that State a strong determination to do whatever may be in the power of that people to educate the colored people of Mississippi. It is my understanding that the views to which I have given expression are shared by all intelligent and liberal-minded men in the South; and that the obstacle to their realization lies not in the reluctance of the Southern people to inaugurate a broad and thorough system of popular instruction, in which the colored race shall have an equal share, but in their real or supposed inability to meet the expense involved in its establishment and maintenance. The war left them in an impoverished condition from which they have not wholly recovered. They are not accustomed to expend as large sums of money for public purposes as the Northern States do. What is now proposed to be done is for them somewhat of a novelty and an experiment. Undoubtedly there is an element in the South, which must be taken into account, which is prejudiced against it and hostile to it. I think it a reasonable request, which the South prefers, for national assistance, and that it should meet with a prompt and generous response, uninfluenced by sympathy or sentiment, and based wholly upon our conviction that what is for their interest is for ours also, and calculated to give stability and permanence to our form of government, as well as to add to the wealth and happiness of the people of the entire Union.

But I must add, Mr. President, that unless we can be assured that the distribution of the moneys appropriated will be fairly made, and that the negro children of the South will receive their proportional part of the fund thus created, I can not, in justice to my constituents, or to my own convictions of what is right, give this bill my vote. If the bill passes, I take it for granted that it will be with this understanding on the part of every Senator from States which have no direct interest in its passage, and who vote for it on the grounds which I have hinted. The appropriation, if made at all, must be intrusted to the officers of the States which receive the grant. The constitutionality of any other mode of procedure in its disbursement would at least be a question for argument. But I think it advisable to limit the operation of the act to five years, instead of ten years as proposed in the first section. Then if the object for which the appropriation is made is not accomplished, or if it appears that the fund is misapplied or misappropriated, or if the occasion for it ceases, no renewal of the grant need be made.

The purpose of this legislation, whatever we may say about it, is or ought to be to reach that class of people in the South who are not being educated to-day as they should be, and who, according to the reports from the Southern States, the States themselves are not able to educate as they should be.

I believe that by passing a proper and reasonable bill of this general tenure the Southern States will be enabled to institute a common-school system which will meet with our approval, and that once established they will maintain it without permanent assistance from the General Government.

It has been said that there was danger in instituting this policy and giving it over to any of the States of this Union, and I have felt myself that it might be possible that we were inaugurating a basis of education by the National Government that it might in the future be difficult to get rid of, even after the people of the Southern States, where the most of this illiteracy exists, should have come out of that condition of illiteracy in which they are found to-day. I believe that there is some risk in the inauguration of this system, because we all know that it is sometimes difficult to get rid of things after the purpose for which the law or whatever it may have been was passed has accomplished the end that was sought.

But here is a condition of affairs that has been shown over and over again by Senators on this floor, and it is our duty to meet it and we must face it; and my judgment is, my conviction is that we should go straight to the point, to the difficulty, and do whatever may be necessary on our part to remove that and then stop and leave out of view all the States of the North where there is no such difficulty existing.

I would define the States to which this appropriation is made by characterizing them as States in which the ratio of negro to white population is not less than one to twenty-five persons.

Here let me say, Mr. President, that if you will amend this bill so as to do that you will fitly take in the Southern States heretofore having slavery within their borders, and none of the other States except I believe the State of Kansas, which has a little more than that ratio of colored people within its borders. My opinion is, however, that the State of Kansas would not desire to be included in the measure.

I find that the proportion of persons who, being of the age of 10 years and over, can not write, in those States, is 75 per cent. of the whole number of such persons in the United States. The bill, as drawn, proposes an appropriation of $105,000,000. I propose that we appropriate three-quarters of one-half of this amount, or $40,000,000, which will be sufficient, if the appropriation is made for five years only and to apply only to the States which have this large negro population, too large for them to handle without help.

I have another suggestion to make, which appears to be worthy of consideration. Different views have been expressed by Senators who have spoken, on the question whether it would be better to make an increasing appropriation (the smallest amount the first year), or a decreasing appropriation (the largest amount the first year) as proposed in the bill before us. A decreasing appropriation, it is thought, would prepare a State receiving the benefit of Federal aid to dispense with it gradually. But it is doubtful whether a State without previous preparation would be in position to avail itself at once of the larger sum.

The Senator from Mississippi says that they are prepared to-day to receive the whole sum they would get if the bill should pass as it has been reported from the committee. The Senator from Indiana by some reference to tables that he makes shows that they are not in condition, and I have had the pleasure of talking with other Senators representing Southern States, and some of them have told me unqualifiedly that they were not prepared to receive the large sum of money that would come to them if this bill should pass as it is reported by the committee. Take for instance the State of South Carolina. I think it is true that that State pays about a half-million dollars of school-tax every year. She will get under the bill, as I understand, nearly a million dollars. I understand further that the State would not be in a condition to use the first year the large sum that would be coming to her under this appropriation if the bill should be passed as it is reported by the committee.

Then, in my judgment, if we drop out of view all the Northern States and the Territories, and reduce the operation of the bill to five years, and begin with a smaller sum and run up and then down again, it would be more in harmony with the proper expenditure of the money than it would be if the bill should pass as it is reported. Why not make an appropriation which shall be first increased annually and afterward diminished? Time will be required for the erection of additional schoolhouses and for the employment of competent teachers and to gather the children into schools. The largest sum will not be needed the first year, and the existing school machinery in some of these States is not properly constituted and organized to make the best possible use of the money. I would very much prefer to make an appropriation, say of $6,000,000 the first year, $8,000,000 the second, $10,000,000 the third, $9,000,000 the fourth, and $7,000,000 the fifth, or at least on this principle, whatever the amount.

Finally, the distribution of this money among the States should, I think, be made not on the basis of the number of illiterate persons of all ages in each, but on that of some agreed standard of school age, and it should be on the basis of school age rather than of school attendance.

If the views which I have submitted to the Senate meet with favor, I propose to submit, at the proper time, after an opportunity for the expression of opinion has been given, the following amendments, which, if I do not mistake the feeling of Senators on this side of the Chamber, will facilitate its passage by removing the ground of some of the objections which have been urged against it.

1. Amend the first section by striking out, in line 3, the word "ten" and inserting the word "five."

2. Amend the first section by striking out, in line 5, the word "fifteen" and inserting "six;" strike out, in line 6, the word "fourteen" and insert "eight;" strike out, in line 7, the word "thirteen" and insert "ten;" strike out, in line 8, all after the word "dollars," also all of line 9 and line 10, and line 11 as far as to the semicolon, and insert as follows: "The fourth year the sum of $9,000,000, and the fifth year the sum of $7,000,000."

3. At the close of the first section, strike out the words "the United States" and insert "such of the United States as contain a negro population in proportion to the white population of the said States, severally, of not less than one negro to twenty-five whites."

4. Amend the second section as follows: Strike out in line 2 the word 'Territories;" strike out in the same line the words "the several" and insert the words "each of the aforesaid;" in lines 5 and 6 strike out the words "United States" and insert the words "said States collectively;" also strike out in line 4 the words "of the age of ten years and over" and insert "between the ages of ten and —— years."

5. In the third, fourth, eighth, tenth, eleventh, thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth sections strike out the words "and Territories and the District of Columbia" wherever the said words occur, and all similar equivalent expressions.

We have the District of Columbia included in this bill. I see no necessity for it. Congress has entire control over the District of Columbia. We can make appropriations here for school purposes whenever we see proper, and my object is, as I said before, to try to eliminate from this bill all this outside legislation and reach the evil which all of us now are desirous to reach by giving relief to those States or the people of the Southern States where this mass of ignorance exists, resulting from the negro population.

6. Strike out the sixth and seventh sections, also the twelfth section, and change the numbers of the remaining sections accordingly.

If I have succeeded in making my meaning clear, Mr. President, the Senate will understand that my aim in suggesting these amendments is to give to this measure greater precision of purpose, to remove from it all appearance of a combination to extract money from the National Treasury for the use of the States, and to make the education of the freedmen and their offspring avowedly a charge upon the resources of all the States, instead of imposing this burden on a minority of the people of the United States, least able and possibly least willing to assume it. We all know that the cost of educating the negro race must be met by the white citizens either of the South unaided or of the entire country irrespective of locality.

It appears to me to be just that the Northern States should contribute their share of this expense, since they will share the benefits of the work accomplished; and if the negro race is left in ignorance, they must suffer in common with the South the evil results of such neglect. I think that I am justified in characterizing such neglect as criminal; it is certainly most short-sighted and unwise. If this bill can be so amended as to render it reasonably sure that the end which we all have in view in its passage will be attained, the people of my State, irrespective of party, will sustain my action in voting for it. But the bill would be stronger before the people if, instead of offering a bonus to States which have no considerable number of freedmen within their borders as an inducement to support the measure, the scope of the bill were strictly limited to the accomplishment of the one great purpose which alone affords or constitutes its reason and its justification.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the constitutionality of this bill has been assailed with great earnestness and ability by some with whom I am generally in accord on political questions. It has also been defended with equal zeal and ability. I might rest on the defense made by its friends, but being a member of the committee which reported the bill, and having taken great care in the committee to divest the measure of all constitutional objections, I prefer to state the grounds of my faith in its constitutionality, and especially so since those who deny it deduce ulterior consequences to its passage to which I am by no means committed.

In the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution it is provided that "the Congress shall have power to levy and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States," &c.

In the second clause of section 3, article 4 of that instrument, it is also provided that "the Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States," &c.

Upon one or both of these clauses all donations and grants in aid of education in the States must rest.

That the phrase "to provide for the general welfare of the United States" used in the taxing clause which I have read is not a substantive, distinct, and independent power under which Congress may do anything deemed by it to be conducive to the general welfare is, I think, now well settled in the practice of the legislative and executive departments, as well as by the decisions of the courts. That the Federal Government is one of delegated, limited, and enumerated power is not now, I believe, denied.

It seems to be conceded that whenever we exercise a power we are bound to look to the Constitution for it; and that any exercise of a power not granted by the Constitution is on our part a pure usurpation. These are my views, at least, and I shall adhere to them. The Constitution, like all other instruments, must be construed, must be interpreted, in order to ascertain its meaning. This construction and this interpretation should be according to the plain meaning of the words employed; and where words or phrases are of doubtful import, they should receive that construction which will carry out the obvious purpose and intent of the instrument as a whole, if the words used will admit of it. It should also, like all other laws, be so construed as to give every word and phrase in it some meaning and effect; for it is not to be supposed that in so solemn an instrument, drawn with so much care, any word or provision is superfluous.

The phrase "to provide for the general welfare of the United States" gave rise to controversy from the very beginning. Under it power was claimed which, if conceded, would have made the Federal Government unlimited. On the other hand it was contended that it had no force or effect whatever. A third ground was that it was a limitation upon the otherwise unlimited power of taxation, granted in the former part of that clause.

It is wholly unnecessary at this day to examine the arguments on which these several constructions were based. It is sufficient for the present to note that there were controversy and dispute, and to ascertain whether in the subsequent practice of the Government the true meaning has been established. For I do not doubt that if a particular construction has for a long period, commencing at the birth of the Constitution and continuing to the present day, been adopted, such construction is binding on us. Though each of us must judge for himself of the meaning of the Constitution, which he has sworn to support, he can not follow blindly his own private views and opinions without reference to the construction put on it by those who have administered the Government before us and by the courts empowered by the Constitution to explain and construe it, and by the acquiescence and consent of the people.

If we do this, sir, the meaning of the Constitution can never be settled, which is the same thing as saying it can never be known what the Constitution is. At every change in the personnel of the executive, legislative, or judicial departments we shall have a new, that is a different, constitution. For the Constitution is not the mere parchment and the ink on it formed into words, but it is what the people, whose instrument it is, whose government it creates, do habitually and suffer to be done in the normal and regular action of their government. It has a life, a living soul derived from the life and action of the people under it. A construction put upon it by this life and action can not be rejected because it may not accord with our private views. It must not be forgotten that we can not arrogate to ourselves a power of constitutional construction which by discarding a construction settled in practice we deny to those who have gone before us.

If we can disregard a construction settled by our predecessors we can not claim that we have a right to make a construction which will bind our successors. Under this view the Constitution would be a chameleon, changing with the times, one thing this year and quite another thing the next. There would be nothing stable, nothing certain. No man could know his rights, duties, or obligations under the Constitution until those in power at the time shall have decided what they are; nor would the trouble end with such decision, for, if precedents are of no value, the same men might change their minds, as several Senators seem to have done on this very question, and afterward reach a different conclusion. As to questions pertaining to private rights and cognizable by the courts, such uncertainty would be intolerable. In such cases the uncertainty would amount to creating a government of men, not a government of the laws. To prevent this and to give peace and safety to the people and security to private rights, it is essential to adhere to the maxim stare decisis.

The necessity for a stable and certain construction of the political powers granted by the Constitution is almost as great. I do not mean to say that whenever Congress shall, by assuming a power, decide that it is warranted by the Constitution, such decision shall be final if it be wrong. That would give to faction, passion, and ignorance a dangerous power to overthrow the Constitution. In such a case it would be the duty of the people to arrest the usurpation by sending here Representatives and Senators who would reverse the improper action. This was done in relation to the alien and sedition laws in the first year of this century. But where a particular construction of the Constitution has prevailed in practice for a long period, and in successive Congresses, it may be assumed that the people not only acquiesce in but adopt it. What they adopt in the way of construction can not be denied by their representatives and servants. I insist, therefore, that any construction of the Constitution which has prevailed in actual practice for a long number of years, and is thus acquiesced in and adopted by the people, becomes the act of the people and can not be set aside by us, their mere servants, at our will and pleasure. No greater or more dangerous power can be assumed by us; and for one I decline to assume it.

Mr. President, if it were a new question, if I were at liberty to put for the first time a construction on the words in the taxing clause of the Constitution, "to provide for the general welfare," I would say that the provision for this welfare must be by an appropriation of money to carry out some one or more of the grants specially enumerated in subsequent clauses of the Constitution. I believe Mr. Madison's view on that subject was the correct one as an original question. But, sir, that construction is no longer possible. Congress has exercised, with the consent and approbation of the people from the very beginning of the Constitution to the present time, the power to appropriate money for purposes which they judged were for the general welfare and outside of the scope of the other powers specifically enumerated in the Constitution. It is now settled that Congress may appropriate money not intended to carry out any specific grant of power, but solely to provide for the general welfare of the United States.

Many of these objects for which appropriations have been made were enumerated by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] and among them are the establishment of the Military and Naval Academies, erecting statues to heroes and statesmen, the celebration of the Centennial, the celebration at Yorktown, relief to communities suffering from overflows and great conflagrations, from a failure of crops, carrying breadstuffs to Europe, furnishing provisions for the people of Venezuela, relief from an earthquake at New Madrid, and others of a similar character. Certainly none of these were necessary means to carry out the other powers specifically enumerated in the Constitution. Mr. Monroe's view on this subject has been generally acquiesced in, and acted on in practice, that Congress may appropriate money to provide for the general welfare, to objects of a general, not merely a local nature, although such objects may not be within the other enumerated powers. But it must be remembered that this power is merely a power of appropriation of money. It does not draw with it the right to usurp a power reserved to the States or to the people. It does not in the least enlarge the powers specifically granted, nor diminish a power reserved to the States or to the people.

Congress may appropriate money to erect a statue to General Washington or any other great man, but it has no power to erect such statue as a national work in a State contrary to its will. It may give money to aid sufferers from an overflow or great conflagration, but it has no power to interfere with or control the poor laws of a State. Congress may give, but under the cover of a gift it can not invade or impair any right or authority or privilege belonging to a State or justly claimed under its laws. The Constitution grants Congress the power to collect taxes and expend the money raised in order to provide for the general welfare of the United States, but it confers under this grant no substantive and independent power to do anything else.

So I hold, sir, that this Congress may pass this bill giving to the States the aid of money from the national Treasury for the purpose of education; but as the education of her people is one of the reserved rights of each State, and as no power over this subject is granted by the Constitution to Congress, the right and authority of Congress end with making the appropriation. If this were not so, if Congress by making any appropriation it may deem proper under the general-welfare clause could acquire a jurisdiction and power not granted by the Constitution over the subject to which this appropriation is made, then it would result that this power and jurisdiction of Congress could by its own action and at its own will be extended to every subject to which an appropriation of money could be made. This would in effect make the Federal Government one of unlimited powers.

A gift implies a donor and a donee, and an object to be given—the one to grant something and the other to receive or accept it. It implies nothing more. It certainly does not imply the power to rob. It does not imply any inferiority or subjection in the donee to the donor. A gift may be and is often made between persons in exactly equal conditions, and evenly by an inferior to a superior. The donor can not even compel the acceptance of the gift. The donor may impose conditions on the gift or make it a trust; but neither the conditions nor the trust can effectually exist without acceptance of the gift by the donee. Till then it is a mere proposal or offer, and of no force or effect whatever.

That Congress may make gifts to the States in aid of common-school and also of university education is too well settled to admit of controversy. This has been the practice from the earliest period of our history. This practice also settles that education of the people is in the category of the general welfare of the United States. As clear as this is, yet, sir, it is contended by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] that the power to appropriate, the power to give, includes within it the power to control, to manage, and to govern the donee, to go into the States and take charge of its schools, if the gift be for schools. He says this power results as a logical necessity from the power to appropriate, the power to give.

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator allow me to state my position?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. COKE. It is this, that the Government of the United States has no power under the Constitution to tax the people of the United States in order to raise revenue to be expended on a subject, unless the Government of the United States has jurisdiction over that subject.

Mr. GEORGE. You say that if the Government gives this money Congress can go in and take control of education in the States.

Mr. COKE. I say that the taxing power of the United States can only be exercised in behalf of a subject over which the United States have jurisdiction, and that if the taxing power of the United States is invoked in behalf of the maintenance of a common-school system in the States, it must be because Congress has the jurisdiction over that subject in the States; and because I deny that jurisdiction, I therefore deny that this bill ought to pass.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator from Texas denies the right to give money, as I understand. Yet, sir, he denied with singular inconsistency, as I think, that the power to give land embraced this power of interference and control. The position of the Senator from Texas was, in short, this: The United States may give to the States land for education to be sold by the States for money, and the power to make this gift is perfectly harmless, because it does not include the power to do anything more. It did not embrace the power to interfere with or manage in any way education in the State to which the gift was made. On the other hand he denied the power of the United States to give for education money, because he said that this power necessarily involved the power to control education in the donee State, and even to supersede and destroy all State authority over the subject. What magic there is in "money," which causes this extraordinary effect, is to me utterly inconceivable, and that Senator did not see proper to explain—deeming it I suppose a self-evident truth, as it was, as he stated, a logical necessity. This reasoning, I must admit, is utterly incomprehensible to me, and I believe it will be found equally incomprehensible by the American people.

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. COKE. I stated that Congress had the power to make donations of land in aid of education in the States, and I stated it upon the authority of section 3, article 4 of the Constitution, which reads:

> The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.

Now there is no limitation upon the power of Congress in dealing with public land. The power of Congress over that subject is absolute. Congress can do what Congress pleases with the public lands. Congress can give them away. It gives them to railroads; it gives them to individuals for homesteads; it gives them to soldiers and sailors for bounties; it gives them to States for educational purposes. Congress can make any disposition in the world it pleases of the public lands. Therefore, I say now, and I did say before, that I would vote for a bill granting public lands in aid of education in the States, but that Congress has not the unlimited power under the Constitution to tax the people of the United States and give the money away to anybody. I say that the taxing power can not be exercised except in furtherance of a subject over which Congress has the constitutional jurisdiction; and when the money is raised, if Congress can apply it to a subject, it has a right to follow it and administer the subject.

Mr. GEORGE. I disagree with the Senator all the way through. I do not believe that the clause of the Constitution which he read respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States confines the power there granted to lands, for the clause gives the same power over "other property" of the United States as it does over land, and yet the Senator in construing that clause confines it wholly to land; and then, sir, I deny that Congress has absolute power over land, as I shall show before I take my seat.

The Senator, however, seems to place this peculiar property of money to work out these remarkable results of centralization and usurpation upon the ground that it is raised by taxation. If the Senator had waited, he would have found that I finally got at his idea. That is, that the danger is not in money per se, but in money only as it is affected by the mode in which it is acquired. This must be his position, since the very clause of the Constitution upon which he bases the power of Congress to donate land also equally confers the power to donate money; for the language is, "Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory"—that word stands for "land"—"or other property belonging to the United States." Money, sir, is property, undeniably; and money belonging to the United States is the property of the United States, however it may be acquired.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator allow me a moment there?

Mr. GEORGE. No, sir; I do not want to be further interrupted.

The Senator from Texas would hardly contend that money granted under this clause—if it be money raised by fines, penalties, forfeitures, donation, prize of war—would have any other effect than land or any other property to destroy the equilibrium of the Constitution.

But, sir, where do we find any authority in the Constitution for a difference between money belonging to the United States, whether acquired in one way or the other? It is but money, property, the right of the United States, however it may be acquired. If the Senator means that Congress has no power to raise money by taxation for the purpose of aiding in education in the States, then, if I concede this, it does not help his argument; for an unconstitutional appropriation of money, a void and illegal appropriation of it, can have no other effect than to leave in the United States the right to recover it; it can not have the effect to include in it necessarily another power not claimed or involved in the grant, but denied by it, as is done in this bill. But if the argument be that if we concede the power of raising and appropriating or giving money for education, then we must admit also the power of taking charge of and controlling education, I have a right to ask the Senator to prove this proposition. It can not be proven. The power to appropriate has all along in our history been exercised without a claim even of a power to gain or acquire a new power thereby. I have already shown that the one power does not follow from the other, and it is unnecessary now to repeat the argument.

But, sir, if the United States have no power to give money raised by taxation for education in the States, where does it get the power to exchange that same money for land or "other property," and then give this land or other property for education, as the Senator from Texas concedes they may do. Every acre of land which ever belonged to the United States in Florida, in Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana, and all west of the Mississippi River, was bought by the United States with money raised by taxation. The argument is that the United States may not give the money thus paid for the land; that would be unconstitutional, a gross usurpation, but as soon as the land has been thus acquired it may be donated at once for education. Not only this, but as ships, navy-yards, post-office buildings, custom-houses, court-houses, cannon, rifles, muskets, cavalry horses, transportation wagons are undeniably property included in "other property" mentioned in the clause of the Constitution relied on by the Senator from Texas, and all these belong to the United States, they may, according to his argument, all be given in specie to the States for education, to be sold by them for money; but neither the money paid by the United States for them nor the money for which they might be sold can be given. There is nothing unconstitutional or dangerous in the gift of these, but it is consolidation, centralization, gross usurpation to grant the money which bought them. So remarkable a result, I respectfully submit, needs more argument to sustain it than the mere assertion by any Senator, however learned or however distinguished, that it is a logical necessity.

And, sir, of what value is the constitutional construction contended for by that Senator to prevent centralization, usurpation, by denying the power to give money, when it may be so easily evaded by converting the money into land "or other property" and then giving that? We are bound, even in this day of progress and enlightenment, to presume that the framers of the Constitution possessed at least common sense; that they possessed some idea of the adaptation of means to the end sought. We deny this presumption when we attribute to them a purpose to prevent centralization in the Federal Government by a denial by them of the power to appropriate money in a particular way, and at the same time assume that they gave unrestricted power to appropriate all other kinds of property, purchased by money, in the same way.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAXEY. I understood the Senator from Mississippi to construe this clause of the Constitution, the second clause of section 3 of article 4, "The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States," as covering money because money is "property." If that be true, he will see that that clause of the Constitution which gives Congress power to make all needful rules and regulations for the disposal of the territory in the United States must also give to Congress absolute and unrestricted power over the entire subject of taxation, which can not be true.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator will find that the position taken by his colleague before me [Mr. COKE] that Congress has the autocratic power over the land has no foundation in the Constitution.

But, sir, I may well ask Senators who admit the power of Congress to donate lands and "other property" to aid the States in education, and deny the same power when money is the subject of the gift, on what theory of constitutional construction they reach this conclusion. It is true that the second clause of section 3, article 4, of the Constitution, gives Congress the "power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property belonging to the United States." So far as the present controversy is concerned we may discard all in this clause except the power "to dispose of" land and other property. Do Senators mean that under this clause Congress has an unrestricted and absolute power of disposition to any purpose whatever? If such be their meaning, then Congress is, as to all property belonging to the United States, except, as they say, money arising from taxation, an absolute autocrat. Land, ships, guns, forts and fortifications, public buildings—even the Capitol itself—and all other property may be divided among the favorites and henchmen of members of Congress or given even to foreigners. The gift also may be for any purpose, however immoral or however injurious to the people.

Senators will not, I take it, contend for such an absolute and unrestricted power. Then there must be some limitation on it. Where do we find the limitation? I find it only in the general objects and purposes of the Constitution as expressed in the clause limiting the power of Congress in reference to taxation; that the appropriation must be for the common defense or the general welfare of the United States. If this is not the limitation, there is none. Senators can not find a limitation in the Constitution either broader or narrower than this. Then, sir, if the power of disposing of land and "other property" for the general welfare authorizes a grant to aid the States in education, what prevents the same identical power expressly given by the Constitution over money raised by taxation from authorizing the same grant for education? There is and can be no negative answer to this question.

But, sir, as money is property, and the clause relied on by the Senator from Texas gives the same power over "other property belonging to the United States" as over territory or land, what authority is there for saying that the power given in this clause does not extend to money as well as to land, or for saying that all money is included within the power except money raised by taxation? There is none that I can perceive, and none has been suggested by that distinguished Senator, and none can be pointed out. So, sir, I insist that whoever, like the Senator from Texas, holds that Congress may, under the third section of article 4 of the Constitution, give land to aid in education, must, as a grammatical as well as a logical necessity, concede that Congress may give any "other property belonging to the United States," including money. Sir, the title of the United States to all property which they may own is exactly the same in all respects. There is not a particle of difference recognized in the Constitution. Their title to all and every part is that of a trustee, to be disposed of in accordance with the Constitution.

But it is said, sir, that the bill invades the domain of State sovereignty. In that it undertakes to prescribe the methods of education in the States. I understand that to be the purport of the objection to it urged by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. I deny that the bill assumes to exercise any such power. The bill, sir, is carefully guarded against any and all invasions of this conceded exclusive power of the States over education within their respective limits. It directs simply as a condition of the grant (and a condition subsequent, too, which is very important in this connection) that the money shall be applied to primary as contradistinguished from collegiate education, the purpose being to remove illiteracy in those wholly or but imperfectly educated. The grants of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections, which have been made from the earliest period of our history, were undeniably for common schools and not for high seminaries of learning. This bill differs in no respect from these on this point, unless we regard an enumeration of the studies taught in common schools as having more effect than a general description of them.

Certainly, sir, the enumeration can not be objected to as unwise or unjust in any respect. Reading, writing, and arithmetic are prescribed. Certainly, sir, if we propose to remove illiteracy it can not be done without teaching these essential studies, the gateways through which alone all entrance into a higher education can be made. These are the elements and bases of all education. The bill, therefore, as to these only prescribes that the pyramid shall stand on its base and not on its apex. Certainly, sir, it will not be insisted that education in the common schools shall commence with lectures on astronomy, the differential and integral calculus, with disquisitions on transcendental metaphysics and the like, leaving the poor attendants to look out for themselves to get a knowledge of the alphabet. But it is also complained that the history of the United States is to be taught also. I see no treason to the Constitution nor invasion of the rights of the people in that. If there be any one thing after the mere rudiments of knowledge, the groundwork of all education, more essential to the youth of these States, it is a knowledge of the history of the country in which they live.

But it is further objected that industrial education of girls, whenever practicable, shall also be taught. Whoever shall consider the condition of women in this country with respect to both the necessity of self-support and the want of adequate means in their hands to attain it will rejoice at any step that may be taken which shall tend to ameliorate their condition. I know of no measure which more commends itself to the judgment of the patriot and philanthropist. I shall not enlarge on this subject, for it was far better done than I can do it by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] in his able and instructive speech on yesterday.

Mr. President, I turn now to consider some further objections to this bill made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] who is also a member of the party to which I belong. And here it must be noted that the enemies or opponents of this measure widely differ from each other as to the principles on which they condemn it. The Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] denies the power in Congress to make the gift at all, and deduces from the gift pure and simple all the direful consequences to which I have alluded. The Senator from Missouri, as I understand his argument, admits the power to make the gift, sees nothing wrong or revolutionary in that, no centralization, no consolidation, no invasion of the reserved rights of the States, if only the gift be absolute and unconditional. In his view the Federal Government might respond freely, to use his own expression, to the cry of the States, "Give, give, give!" and whatever else of evil might result, still the Constitution would be safe if no conditions were annexed to the grant. He also stated that the bill was wholly unprecedented in annexing conditions as to the studies to be encouraged and fostered by the grant.

In that the Senator was in error. The act of July 2, 1862 (12 United States Statutes, 503), granting lands to the States for agricultural and mechanical colleges did, without objection to this day, so far as I know, prescribe what should be taught in them. The fourth section of that act went further in that way than does the present bill. That section required the endowment of a college in each State, "where the leading object shall be, without excluding other scientific and classical studies, and including military tactics, to teach such branches of learning as are related to agriculture and the mechanic arts."

Lands have also been granted to all the new States to aid in the erection of colleges and universities wherein the necessary implication was that these institutions should teach the higher branches of human knowledge. So, sir, we have good and valid and unquestioned precedents for so much of this bill as came under the censure of the Senator from Missouri. The agricultural college land act went further than this bill. That arranged for schools for all time to come. This a temporary measure, lasting at furthest only ten years. A precedent will also be found in that act for the provisions in this bill requiring reports from the State authorities.

But, Mr. President, in the things complained of by the Senator from Missouri, this bill undertakes to give no commands, no directions even, to the States. It does not assume or even claim a power or jurisdiction to interfere with education in the States. The bill merely proposes to make a gift to the States out of the common Treasury. It compels no State to accept the gift, and if there be any States, like Texas, and I suppose I may add South Carolina, which have no use for the gift, which are amply able to educate their children, they need not accept it. So if any State, like I suppose Missouri to be, which does not like the conditions on which the gift is made, that State may also reject the gift. The bill, even in the shape of a generous benefactor, proposes to enter no State without its free consent.

The bill merely offers a gift on conditions subsequent to be performed by the State. Every grant of land heretofore made for education has been on a condition that it should be applied to the purposes named in the act of Congress. Land given for common schools and universities can be applied to no other purposes. It is true there was no provision for a forfeiture in these grants, but the grants demanded and secured a higher and better guaranty of faithful application of the land—the plighted honor and faith of the States. What a State can not do without dishonor, without a breach of faith, it can not do at all.

The power to make a gift includes within it the power to prescribe conditions and trusts on which it is made. This is a universal principle so far as there is absolute ownership in the donor of the thing given. If the owner holds the thing clothed with a trust, he may and is in fact bound to prescribe such condition for the grant as are necessary to secure the application of the gift to the objects and purposes of the trust. This bill is in strict subordination to this principle. Congress holds the money for the purpose of and in trust for the general welfare of the United States. It holds lands and other property for the same purpose. It is settled that education is within this trust; hence it is clear that Congress, in making the appropriation, should take care that it should be applied to the proper objects of the grant.

I do not mean to say that Congress in making a grant of money to a State, when it is even for a proper and constitutional purpose, can annex conditions to it inappropriate to attain the proper end or destructive to the constitutional powers and rights of the States. Congress can not grant money or any other thing to a State on condition that it will surrender or impair any of its just powers. The power to appropriate money for the general welfare does not include a power to grant on a condition subversive of the Constitution. Congress can not grant to a State on condition that it will surrender its equal suffrage in the Senate or its power to elect Representatives in Congress or its power to choose its own officers, or its power to regulate its own internal and domestic affairs, or on condition that it will ratify a proposed amendment to the Constitution. In such cases the grant would be void if the condition were precedent, and the condition would be void if it were a condition subsequent. There is no objection of this kind to the conditions in this bill. The conditions relate solely to the expenditure of the money and securing its application to the constitutional purposes for which it was granted, securing this too solely by State agency and under State accountability. It is no answer to this to say, that if we concede the power to prescribe any condition whatever, we concede also the power to prescribe any condition that Congress may see fit to impose. I have shown the line which limits the power of Congress in imposing conditions. It is not to be presumed that Congress will cross it and assume an unconstitutional jurisdiction. A majority in Congress may have the physical power of mere numbers to pass an act in violation of the Constitution, but it possesses this power in relation to every subject on which it may act. And if it be a just argument to deny the just power of Congress in this case, that it may be abused, the argument is equally potent to refuse all power whatever to Congress, for there is none which may not be abused. Paper constitutions impose of themselves no physical restraint. Our sole dependence for an observance of the Constitution is in the honor, intelligence, and virtue of those intrusted with power, and in their accountability to the people.

Mr. President, it was said by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] that it seemed to be conceded on both sides of the Chamber that the power to pass the bill came in some way from the adoption of the three last amendments to the Constitution. What force others may give to these amendments on this subject I know not. I have shown the power exists without reference to these amendments, and that it was exercised even before they were adopted. In my judgment they have nothing to do with this power. They neither add to nor detract from the power of Congress over this subject as it existed when they were adopted. I think, however, that these amendments and the conditions in some of the States produced by them constitute the occasion and necessity for the exercise of the power, but they do not confer it. A construction which would derive the power from them, as being a necessary power to improve a condition of affairs resulting from their adoption, would give unlimited power to Congress as to all matters pertaining in any way to their subject-matter; and this view has been expressly denied by the Supreme Court.

Mr. President, I have always been in favor of a strict construction of the grants of power made in the Constitution. I have always dreaded centralization—the having a splendid national government with impotent and emasculated States. I have resisted and shall continue to resist all measures which tend in that direction. But I can not shut my eyes to the history of the past. Whether I like it or not I must submit to irreversible accomplished facts. True statesmanship has to do with facts, practical and sometimes hard and unpleasant facts; it is not to be absorbed in vain speculations or abstractions, or even vain regrets for what has been accomplished. As the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] well said, governments grow. This growth is a necessity of human nature. In the growth of this Government, theories I held dear have been overturned forever. I once believed that a State had a right to secede from the Union. I believe now the right then existed, but it has been lost—irrevocably lost—amid the clang of arms and the horrors of war.

I once denied that the Federal Government is the final judge of its own powers, yet that has been so firmly established that no one, not even my friend from Texas [Mr. COKE], will deny it. These opinions I must surrender, however unwillingly. I will not feed on the dry husks and emasculated remains of constitutional theories which, however respectable in their origin, however once potent, now no longer control or influence the Government. We live in the present, we are actors in the present and for the present, we must meet the demands of the present.

The world moves, and we must move with it, keeping abreast with all the practical questions which may arise and seeking their solution for the interest and welfare of the people. I will not pass my life in a dreamy contemplation of the beauties and excellencies of obsolete theories, now mere abstractions, and in picturing the benefits or glories which would have come from their observance. It is enough to know that they are no longer potent for the good or evil of the Union. They are gone, gone forever, and while I may indulge a tear over the tomb in which they lie buried, I will not pass my life in erecting altars to them or in ministering at altars erected by others.

I sincerely regret the present tendency to centralization. I have resisted it, and will continue to do so. I shall continue to urge economy in expenditures, a decrease in the number and in the emoluments of offices. I shall resist all class legislation, all grants of subsidies and benefits to a few at the expense of the many. I shall continue to resist the tendency to a paternal government, and shall strive to preserve as far as possible what remains of local self-government.

I do not depart from these principles when I support this bill, the effects of which will be to elevate and advance the State governments by advancing and elevating the great mass of the people of the States. I do not war against local self-government when I sustain a measure which tends to make that self-government safe and respectable, and even possible, in some of the States.

I do not add unduly to the powers of the Federal Government when I vote for a bill which has the sanction of precedents from the earliest days to the present time, and which, unlike most of the legislation of Congress of late years, gives no exclusive privileges to any, but confers a great boon on those who most need it, the great mass of our people, the workers and toilers, by whose muscle, intelligence, and energy we have achieved the grand material results of our present civilization.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President——

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Senator from Texas give way to a motion to adjourn? It is now half-past 4.

Mr. COKE. I only desire to speak a few minutes. I will yield the floor, if it is desired.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BLAIR. I hope the Senator will withdraw the motion. It is quite early, and there has not been much said on the question as yet.

Mr. PLUMB. I am sorry for that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VAN WYCK in the chair). Does the Senator from Kansas insist on his motion?

Mr. PLUMB. I will withdraw the motion if the Senator from Texas desires to speak now.

Mr. COKE. I am entirely willing to yield if the Senate wishes to adjourn.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. BLAIR. I hope the Senate will not adjourn now. There must be others who would like to speak on this matter, and we must close it at some time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. BLAIR. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 20, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—20.

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Bayard, | Dolph, | Hawley, | Morgan, |
| Beck, | Farley, | Kenna, | Pendleton, |
| Camden, | Gibson, | Lapham, | Plumb, |
| Cockrell, | Harris, | Maxey, | Saulsbury, |
| Coke, | Harrison, | Miller of Cal., | Vest. |

NAYS—27.

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Allison, | Dawes, | Logan, | Platt, |
| Blair, | Frye, | McMillan, | Pugh, |
| Brown, | Garland, | Mahone, | Ransom, |
| Call, | George, | Mitchell, | Vance, |
| Cameron of Wis., | Hampton, | Morrill, | Van Wyck, |
| Colquitt, | Hoar, | Palmer, | Williams. |
| Conger, | Lamar, | Pike, | |

ABSENT—29.

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Aldrich, | Gorman, | Jones of Nevada, | Sherman, |
| Anthony, | Groome, | McPherson, | Slater, |
| Bowen, | Hale, | Manderson, | Voorhees, |
| Butler, | Hill, | Miller of N. Y., | Walker, |
| Cameron of Pa., | Ingalls, | Riddleberger, | Wilson. |
| Cullom, | Jackson, | Sabin, | |
| Edmunds, | Jonas, | Sawyer, | |
| Fair, | Jones of Florida, | Sewell, | |

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. ["No!" "No!"] And on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator from Missouri will just permit me, I wish to say that I opposed the motion to adjourn because I understood the Senator from Texas desired to speak, and I do not want the friends of this measure put in a position a little later on where it can be said that they have wasted the time and therefore are not entitled to have this great question considered any longer. If the enemies of this measure think, or if for any reason anybody thinks, that on the whole we ought to adjourn, I shall not oppose it, but I do not like to have the friends of the measure put in the position of having agreed to adjourn at half-past 4 when there remains an hour certainly, or an hour and a half of time which can be given to the bill. We do nothing to-morrow, and the public business is pressing in every direction.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understood precisely the reverse of what the Senator from New Hampshire says. I understand that the Senator from Texas does not desire to proceed this evening, and if he does not desire to speak this evening the Senate will certainly not force him to do it. Therefore I have moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, on which the yeas and nays are demanded.

Mr. ALLISON. It is not necessary at this moment to have the yeas and nays.

Mr. COCKRELL. Very well. I withdraw the call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The call for the yeas and nays is withdrawn. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 193) to provide for printing certain documents relating to customs revenues and domestic exports for the use of Congress was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 28, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

FRENCH SPOLIATION CLAIMS.

Mr. SCALES. I desire to submit a privileged report from the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will submit it.

Mr. SCALES. The Committee on Printing report back with an amendment the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be authorized to cause 4,000 copies of House Report No. 109, relative to French spoliation claims, together with the exhibits, to be printed; exhibit A, message of President Polk; exhibit B, message of President Pierce; exhibit C, report of Charles Sumner; exhibit D, a number of committee reports.

The amendment was to add to the resolution the following:

And the letter of the Secretary of State addressed February 11, 1884, to General W. R. Cox, a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, marked as exhibit E.

Mr. COX, of New York. Where does this resolution come from?

The SPEAKER. It is a privileged report from the Committee on Printing. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment reported from the Committee on Printing.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question was upon adopting the resolution as amended.

Mr. COX, of New York. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. COX, of New York. One word. Nearly all the documents referred to in this resolution are very easily obtainable, either from the hall library of the House or the library upstairs, especially the messages of the Presidents on the subject of French spoliations. I suppose this publication is intended merely as a preparation to passing that old stale bill for the payment of French spoliation claims which has been hanging around the Capitol here for fifty or sixty years. I am opposed to printing these various documents, because with very little research they can be found among documents already published.

Mr. SCALES. This resolution was reported to the House by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, recommending the printing of these various documents for the use of members of the House. The resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing, and upon examination we deemed these documents of sufficient importance to be printed in order that the members of the House might be able fully to understand the bill now pending before the House. I hope the resolution will be adopted. It provides for printing the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, nothing else, except two or three messages of Presidents and a letter from the Secretary of State in regard to this important matter pending before Congress for many years, and the whole cost of the publication will be about $180; no more.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. SCALES. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman state whether or not these documents have not all been long since printed?

Mr. SCALES. Some have been, and some have not.

Mr. HOLMAN. And it is proposed to print them again?

Mr. SCALES. Those that have not been printed will add very little to the cost of printing. These several documents have been put together in convenient form for reference, and it is proposed to print them in that form as it is difficult to obtain them anywhere else.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I would inquire of the gentleman what is the necessity of printing 4,000 copies of these documents?

Mr. SCALES. For the information of members and to enable them to distribute to their constituents who are claimants. If it is thought that the number is too high, the House can cut it down.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. For examination by claimants?

Mr. SCALES. Yes.

Mr. COX, of New York. The bill will never be reached at this session of Congress.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Why should Congress print documents for the benefit of claimants?

Mr. SCALES. This printing, as I have stated, is a matter of great importance, not only for the information of members themselves, but that members may have the documents for distribution. Nearly all members have some of these claimants among their constituents, and they desire to distribute these documents among them. Four thousand copies is a very small number for that purpose.

Mr. HOLMAN. All the documents, with the exception of the one mentioned in the amendment, have been printed before.

Mr. SCALES. Certainly.

Mr. CHACE. There is the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of this session.

Mr. HOLMAN. It occurs to me that it is not necessary to reprint the documents which have already been printed long since. All of these have been printed except the letter of the Secretary of State to General COX, of this House. Of course no proper objection can be made to the publication of that letter, for it is new matter and we do not know what it is.

I will ask my friend from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] to consent to the publication of that letter simply. The other documents have been printed and before Congress for forty or fifty years—some of them more than that length of time. I hope my friend will consent to print the document mentioned in the amendment and nothing else.

Mr. SCALES. I am not authorized to accept any amendment, for this is the action of the committee. I desire simply to state the reasons influencing the Committee on Printing in making this recommendation.

The great trouble in coming to a proper conclusion in the Committee on Foreign Affairs and in the House upon this important matter of the French spoliation claims is the difficulty of getting proper information in convenient form. This is a matter in which a great many are interested. It is important that the House should be thoroughly informed in regard to it. The Committee on Printing came to the conclusion that in the case of a bill involving so large an amount, in which so many persons are interested, all the information possible in regard to it should be made accessible to every member. I think the information should be printed for the use of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will ask whether the documents embraced in this proposition include veto messages upon bills providing for payment of these claims?

Mr. SCALES. I will say to my friend that it will cost very little more to print all these documents than to print one-half or two-thirds of them.

Mr. HOLMAN. In order to bring this whole subject before the House, if it is thought proper to provide for getting all these documents together, I move to amend the resolution by adding, "and veto messages which have been communicated to Congress upon bills passed by the two Houses." I believe there are two such messages.

Mr. SCALES. I have no objection to that amendment, as one at least, if not two of them, have been provided for.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] moves to amend the resolution so as to include all veto messages sent to either House of Congress upon French spoliation bills.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. SCALES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DOCUMENTS RELATING TO CUSTOMS REVENUES, ETC.

Mr. SCALES. I am also directed by the Committee on Printing to report back with amendments the joint resolution (H. Res. 193) to provide for printing certain documents relating to customs revenues and domestic exports for the use of Congress.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to print for the use of Congress —— copies of Senate Miscellaneous Document No. 46, first session Forty-sixth Congress, with additional data, to be furnished by the compiler of said Senate document, showing the imports for the fiscal years ended June 30, 1879, 1880, 1881, 1882, and 1883, and a compilation of exports the growth, produce, and manufacture of the United States from 1789 to 1883, inclusive (ninety-four years), in which the quantity, value, and value per unit of quantity of each article are given by fiscal years and decades, also the value exported to each country and value from each State, with other additional data, prepared by Charles H. Evans, of the Treasury Department.

SEC. 2. That the documents described in the foregoing section be stitched and bound as one volume; that —— copies of the same be for the use of the House of Representatives, and —— copies for the use of the Senate.

The amendments reported by the Committee on Printing were read, as follows:

Amend the first section by inserting in the blank "4,200."

Amend the second section by filling the first blank with "3,000," and the second blank with "1,000."

Add to the second section the following:

Fifty for the House Library; fifty for the Senate Library; fifty for the Congressional Library; fifty for Ways and Means Committee.

The amendments reported by the committee were agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCALES moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY.

Mr. SCALES. I am also instructed by the Committee on Printing to report back with a favorable recommendation a concurrent resolution of the Senate for printing extra copies of Hilgard's Coast and Geodetic Survey.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 3,000 extra copies of the report of Julius E. Hilgard, Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, showing the progress made in said survey during the year ending June 30, 1883, for distribution by said Superintendent.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. SCALES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BUREAU OF ETHNOLOGY—GEOLOGICAL SURVEY.

Mr. SCALES. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of joint resolution (H. Res. 137) for printing the annual reports of the Bureau of Ethnology, and joint resolution (H. Res. 138) for printing the annual reports of the United States Geological Survey, and that these joint resolutions be recommitted to the Committee on Printing.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

SALARY OF HOUSE TELEGRAPH OPERATOR.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I desire to present a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts upon the joint resolution (H. Res. 48) regarding the salary of the telegraph operator of the House of Representatives.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the joint resolution of Mr. MUTCHLER—

"That from the 4th day of March, 1883, the salary of the telegraph operator of the House of Representatives shall be $1,200 per annum; and a sufficient sum is hereby appropriated out of the contingent fund of the House to pay the difference between $720 and $1,200, said amount to be immediately available"— respectfully report the following substitute and ask its passage:

"Resolved, &c., That the salary of the telegraph operator shall be $1,200 per annum from the beginning of the present session of Congress; and the amount necessary to pay the difference between $720 and $1,200 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, said amount to be immediately available."

Mr. HOLMAN. I raise a question of order on this proposition. I am not at all aware whether this salary ought to be increased or not. I presume, however, it ought not.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. If the gentleman will give me the opportunity I think I may be able to satisfy him that this proposition ought to be adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe that none of these official salaries ought to be increased. I am very confident of that. But, Mr. Speaker, I rose to submit a point of order. The Committee on Accounts is entitled to report at any time, just as the Committee on Ways and Means and the Committee on Appropriations in their respective jurisdictions have the same privilege. But still the fact a committee is entitled to report at any time does not exempt the report of the committee from the requirement of the rule that in making an appropriation the subject shall be considered in the Committee of the Whole House. I desire to make that point of order.

Mr. ERMENTROUT rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana makes the point of order that this resolution, or rather the substitute, proposes to make an appropriation out of the Treasury, and therefore must, under the rule, be considered first in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MUTCHLER. If my colleague will yield to me, I will say that I do not regard this as a resolution of that character. It simply is a resolution increasing the pay of one of the employés of this House.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will permit the Chair, he will state that the original resolution proposes not to make any additional appropriation, but simply to apply money already appropriated out of the contingent fund of the House to the payment of this officer. The substitute, however, proposes to make a new appropriation out of the Treasury, and that brings the resolution within the purview of the rule of the House that bills and joint resolutions making appropriations of money out of the Treasury shall have their first consideration in the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. MUTCHLER. With the permission of the Chair I desire to make a brief statement in regard to this matter, and then I shall ask the gentleman from Indiana to withdraw his point of order.

I introduced this resolution as an act of justice to a faithful officer of this House. The office of telegraph operator was created by act of Congress, I think during the Forty-third Congress, and fixed the pay at $100 a month for each operator of the Senate and of the House.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana insist on his point of order?

Mr. HOLMAN. I will reserve it until I hear from the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MUTCHLER. I think it was the Forty-third Congress that passed the law creating the office of telegraph operator for the Senate and the House. That act limited the compensation to be paid to $100 each a month. The Senate has paid their officer and still continue to pay him that amount of compensation. The duties performed by the telegraph operators are in their character the same, but the telegraph operator of the House performs three times the amount of duties performed by the telegraph operator of the Senate, and yet does not receive the pay equal to that paid to the telegraph operator of the Senate. I am reliably informed the telegraph operator of the House sends three times the number of messages sent by the telegraph operator of the Senate. For some reason, which I can not explain, the Committee on Appropriations places the telegraph operator of the House upon the roll of common laborers. He is an officer who performs skilled labor, and there is no reason why he should be put down as a common laborer. The Western Union pay their employés from $90 to $120 per month, and it seems to me it is a simple act of justice on the part of this House to withdraw this officer from the roll of common laborers and to place him upon an equality with the telegraph operator of the Senate by paying him the same compensation of $100 per month. I therefore ask the gentleman from Indiana to withdraw his point of order and let the House act upon the matter now pending.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not being willing to discuss the question at this time as to the relative pay of officers of the House and Senate, hoping before this session closes the present Congress will apply some remedy in that regard—without discussing that question at all at the present time, I wish to state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I think $100 a month during the session of Congress is a reasonable compensation; but we are paying beyond that, for we pay not only during the session of Congress, but during the vacation, when these officers have nothing to do comparatively. I am willing if the resolution goes through to pay this man at the rate of $100 per month during the session of Congress. If my friend will accept that I will withdraw the point of order.

I hope the fact that most of our employés are employed during the session of Congress only will be taken into consideration in our legislation on these matters. I think this gentleman should be satisfied with $100 a month during the time Congress is in session. I will say to my friend from Pennsylvania I am willing to fix the salary of both these telegraph operators at $900 per annum each, and I think that will be a very high salary. If my friend does not think $900 a year enough, I must insist on my point of order.

The SPEAKER. The point of order being insisted on——

Mr. MCMILLIN. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The original resolution, as the Chair has already stated, proposed simply to apply so much money out of the contingent fund as might be necessary, that money having already been appropriated, but the substitute proposes to make a new appropriation, and therefore the Chair thinks the point of order is well taken, and the matter should have its first consideration under the rule in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MUTCHLER. If the resolution is open to amendment, I will move to strike out that portion proposing to make an appropriation of money.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand the regular order of business. The gentleman's amendment will not change the effect of the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the joint resolution is referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.
